Mr. Morrison, in the course of his remarks, stated that since soon after the invention, of printing (the first treatise on game fishing being written in 1497) more than a thousand books had dealt with the subject, giving it therefore one of the foremost places in the realms of sport. Of all game fish, salmon was the most famed and sought but with trout running a close second. The speaker regretted inroads that had been made these fish by unwise and fishing, and the dangers of extinction that still remained in this regard. He spoke of the good that was being done by the hatcheries, which have achieved some measure of success towards restocking streams, ponds, rivers.

Mr. Morrison then dealt with different customs of anglers gave some vivid illustrations fights between fishermen and inhabitants of the deep. The speaker also remarked on the changes climate brought about in game fish, giving as an instance case of brown trout spawn from England, where their maximum weight was about four pounds and planted in New Zealand where the fish attained weights more than twenty pounds. A New Zealand angler was accustomed speaking of his catch in terms tons, and trout had to be netted of the rivers at recurrent intervals as the older fish became cannibals and made serious inroads on the younger fish and fry.

Mr. Morrison concluded his address with a reference to the enjoyment to be derived from angling not only from the point of view of the hunter, but in the growth of the angler's power of observation, his insight into and appreciation of nature and its workings.
