DISASTER AT SYDNEY MINES

and Mr. Purchase. Mrs. Ferguson, with her six children, met The Halifax Herald correspondent. In a flood of tears she expressed her anguish and hoped for the delivery of her husband. A small boy clung to the clothing of the writer and asked:

"When will papa be home?"

All day scores of men were trying to remove the falls of stone.

Inspector Nicholson and Manager Hill have arrived on the surface.

Manager Hill, who is in charge of No. 3 colliery, cannot account for the explosion. John Johnston mine manager, fatigued from a long journey, said: "It is a bad job, but we must make the best of it. Everything will be going smoothly in a few days."

Mr. Cantley told The Herald tonight that the effects of the explosion extended to over a comparatively small area of the mine on the south side. The ventilation is now normal and the colliery will be ready for work in less than a week. Mr. Cantley is very emphatic in asserting that not now, nor was there at any time, a fire in the pit. He will remain for several days.

T. J. Brown has issued special instructions to have the remains of the dead men respectably interred in their family lots and the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal company are prepared to meet all expenses in connection with the funerals.

The people are outspoken in their thanks to Mr. Brown, who has not only proved a hero by going down in the mine, but has tried to remove the pangs of distress by doing all in his power to relieve the sufferings of the widows and orphans.

GREEN WOMAN'S COAT.

In Evanston, which is called a "classic suburb" of Chicago, a woman lost her coat at a missionary meeting. The next day an advertisement in a newspaper stated that there had been taken by mistake at the home of Mrs. ——— "a dark green woman's tailored coat." Whereupon some wags set out to determine what race this "dark green woman" rightly belonged. The "green-eyed" may be.

BRIDLE MADE BY PRISONER.

A prisoner in the Montana state prison sent a note to a stockman and shipper asking him if he would buy a horsehair bridle which he had made after months of hard work. The prisoner said that he had made the bridle to earn enough money to have his case before the board of pardons. The stockman replied that he would undertake to sell the product, and was able to dispose of it for $50.

FOR FRENCH TEETOTALISM.

There are some Frenchmen who consider that the consumption of wine is a mistake for a congress of 'buveurs d'esu' (drinkers of water) recently held at Grenoble, delegates from this country were present in addition to representatives from the north of Europe England and Italy. Nearly all the nations in Europe were represented, and the 120 delegates claimed a following of over 85,000 total abstainers in France and Aabroad.

The program of the congress embraced much more than the question of how best to combat the ravages of strong drink, for it was explained, the problem of alcoholism is intimately connected with the questions of the social uplifting of the working classes, criminality, depopulation, protection of children and the family, and the raising or degeneration of the race. In the course of the discussion of the aims and objects, the enemies of alcohol protested energetically against the accusation often brought against them that they will never be satisfied until they have uprooted every vine in France and Italy.

On the contrary, declare the drink reformers, what we most ardently desire is to place the grape a hygienic fruit par excellence, within the reach of every one, and to popularize its use by transforming it into syrups and preserves, "products useful to the organism." Besides, if one is to believe the delegates, the culture of the vine for several years past has cost more than it brought in. When the wine harvest is an abundant one, the wine is sold at an unremunerative price; and when, as is the case this year, the price are remunerative, there is nothing to sell. So that, according to the teetolers, it would be better for the 'vignerons' if they replaced their vines with something more practical. The really useful part of the work accomplished by the total abstinence party on the Continent is in the victories they have won in the fight against the scourge of alcoholism, which in recent years has given rise to some anxiety in the large towns in France. Here all men of intelligence and sympathy are with them.

Savants like Dr Legrain, the chief doctor in the chief of asylums for the insane in the Department of the Seine came forward and testified that their example had accomplished more real and durable cures than all the remedies of the Assistance Publique. The Congressists were unanimous in supporting the Governments in so far as they fight against alcoholism, in schools, in the army and navy, and elsewhere. It was agreed that they should be asked to continue the campaign by limiting the number of drinking establishments, by encouraging the fabrication of wines without alcohol, and by paying close attention to the quality of drinking water wherever that is not as good as it ought to be.

Prof. Forel, of the University of Zurich, went so far as to affirm that a single glass of wine, enfeebles the resisting power of the organism; while others, like Dr. Legrain, Gen. Richard, and Profs. Gautrot and Reboud, were of the opinion that so far as fermented liquors are concerned moderation is difficult and practically impossible. For them the only means of effectively and victoriously fighting alcoholism is total abstinence. In the report of the proceeds of the teetotal congress is no reference to the need for a good non-alcoholic drink. Yet the introduction of a really palatable, refreshing and pleasant non-alcoholic beverage would do the cause of temperance a vast amount of good.—Paris Correspondent London 'Globe.'
