GRAIN

WINNIPEG, Jan. 4 —(CP)— Hesitation at Chicago and failure of Liverpool to reflect fully Tuesday's advances on North American exchanges had an uneasy effect on the Winnipeg wheat future market today.

Prices moved in a narrow range and at the close were 1-2-1-4 cent lower, with May at 63 5-8, July 64 1-4 and Oct. 64 1-2 cents. Oct. option showed independent firmness early in the session but slipped later.

Canadian wheat export business was estimated at around 250,000 bushels, worked chiefly from the Pacific coast.

Trading in cash wheat was slow and confined to odd cars of top Northern grades. Coarse grain transactions consisted of a small quantity of barley for export and a few cars of oats and barley for domestic needs.

Italians Have Good Memory--Go Back 13 Centuries For Claims To Tunisia

Rich Colony Biggest Bone In Dog-Fight With France

Helen B. Metcalf is a well-known and widely traveled journalist who has lived in Tunisia and knows that country and its people intimately.

By HELEN B. METCALF

NEA Service Special Correspondent

What is behind Italian demands for return of Tunisia? How do Mussolini's underlings justify their diatribes against French control of that ancient African land?

One must go back about 1300 years for the answer, for Italian peoples have had no governmental control in or of Tunisia since 642 A. D.

Legend says the Phoenician Queen Dido built the famous city of Carthage, almost on the exact site of which the present Tunis, capital of the country, is situated.

In the second century B. C., Carthage fell to Rome, and for all but a few of the next 800 years the whole North African province belonged either to the western or the eastern Roman Empire.

In the 7th century it fell to the Mohammedan Arabs, and was known as the Kingdom of Kairwan. (The present city of Kairwan is the second holiest of the Moslem world; the pilgrim who cannot reach Mecca finds his satisfaction at Kairwan.)

For brief periods Tunis came under the domination of Sicily and Spain, and then in the 16th century was conquered by Turkey, which allowed local autonomy.

RESOURCES APLENTY

Since 1100 A. D., European interests have fought for possession of Tunisian natural resources.

Her coral fisheries on the northern coast are about the finest in the world.

Tunisia is the most fertile of the North African countries. Grain, grapes, citrus, grazing, and special stud farms for horses and cattle are the large industries of the northern region, just above and below the Medjerda River.

Along the eastern coast, the Sahel, there is extensive production of olives, and in the south, near the shotts, the dry salt lakes, about whose shores are the magnificently fertile oases, a great date country.

Tunisia also is extremely rich in phosphates, has some iron, zinc, and lead, and her pink marble from Shemtu is world-famous.

The European powers most concerned have been France, England, and the Italian cities. In addition to concessions for exploitation of Tunisian resources, they sought telephone, telegraph, cable, and railroad concessions. Because the local rulers, the Beys, overtaxed the epople in order to live in unbelievable luxury, concessions to foreign powers were granted happily as sources of additional income.

When unification of the Italian city states into the Kingdom of Italy took place in 1860, the situation became acute. The new Italy immediately wanted to restore old Roman glory. It became evident the Bev was favoring Italy and that Germany and England would not object. France stepped in and took Tunis. As a pretext she used the attacks of the Khroumirs, a marauding Algerian border tribe, but that was only a pretext to cloak thinly the real motives.

MANY FACTORS INVOLVED

The French protectorate was established in 1881. Immediately the French began extensive development and the need for laborers was acute. The Italians flocked in, for Sicily was only 100 sea miles from Tunis. The French took the role of employer, and the Italian of employee, in competition with the native Arab.

Italy wanted to keep her sons and daughters Italian—have them speak Italian, go to Italian supported schools, and share in the government of the Protectorate. France wanted them Gallicized.

The problem grew more and more complicated up until three years ago, when it was believed a final compromise had been reached.

Both school and nationality issues were conceded to the Italians until 1965, when automatic French nationalization of Italian Tunisians was to take place and when all schools were to become French.

Mussolini seemed satisfied and both parties contracted to submit any possible later issues to arbitration.

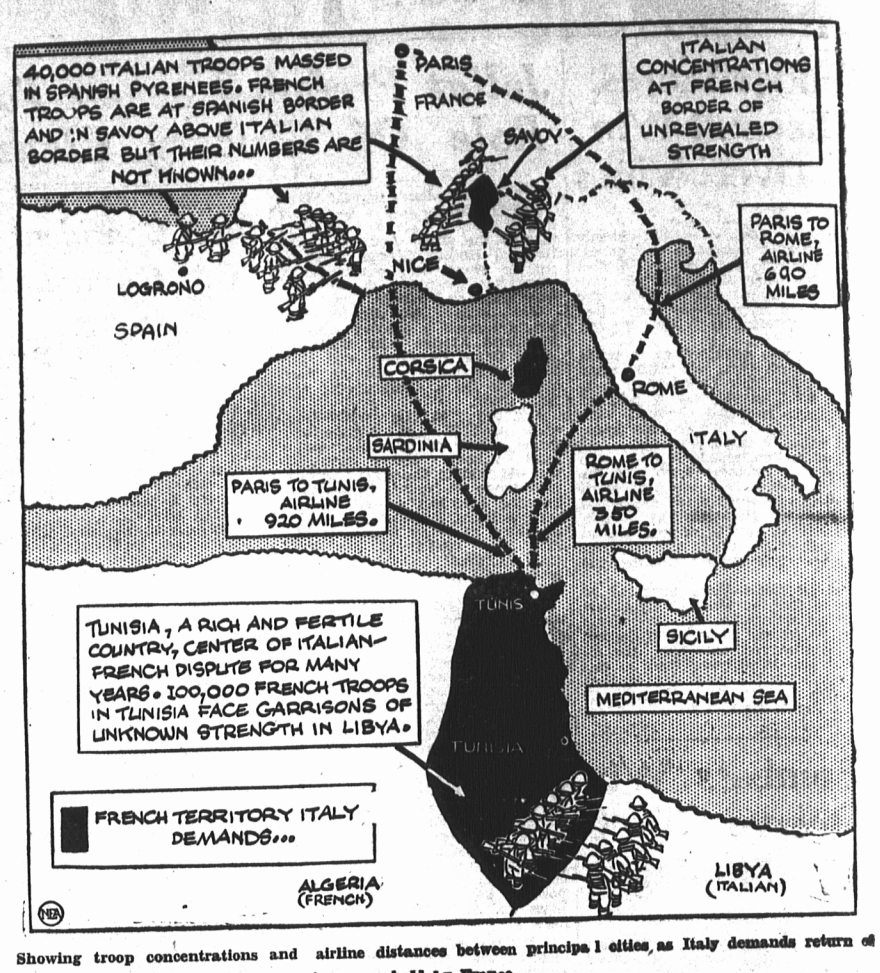
The powers allowed Italy to take Libya, next door to Tunisia, in 1912, and she helped herself to Ethiopia in 1936. Neither country is suited to colonization. Italy must expand or explode, because of surplus population. She needs to supplement her food supply and essential resources.

The resulting situation is this: Germany succeeded at Munich and hopes in time to get back her forfeited African colonies. She may be sympathetic with Italy, although the Franco-German pact may delay or obviate direct support.

If Italy were in Tunisia, she would have nearly complete control of the Mediterranean. Britain could not stand for that.

France has to protect her investment in Tunisia, as well as in Algeria and Morocco. Her manpower in the event of a war must be supplemented from her colonial possessions. The Tunisian harbor of Bizerta and the powerful Karouba airbase are wartime essentials.

Tunisia is boiling—over a fire that has been burning 13 centuries.



Showing troop concentrations and airline distances between principal cities, as Italy demands return of Tunisia and other one-time posses sions now held by France.
