SANDRA THE JEALOUS
By Jane Phelps

WHO COULD SHE BE?

CHAPTER XVI.

"Well, did you go through everything?" Everett asked at dinner that night, the second in my new home.

"Yes, and Everett, Mrs. Gray thought I was going to discharge her. I knew she didn't like me, but I didn't know why until she acted so pleased when I told her I couldn't run this big house, that"—

"You told her that she was to remain?"

"Yes. Don't you want her?"

"Most certainly. But before you make any contracts with servants or anyone else, please consult me," his voice was sharp and I knew he was displeased. But why? He had said he most certainly wanted Mrs. Gray to stay. I had told her the same. Why should he take that tone?

"Oh, Everett! I'm sorry, I didn't think."

"Please think hereafter." He dismissed the subject, and was delightfully entertaining through the remainder of the dinner. Almost as much so as before I married him. When he was like that I forgot everything but my pride in him.

We had been married not quite two weeks and already I felt a craving for companionship, the nearness of one who would understand me, I was infatuated with life, eager for the thrill of new experiences. I longed for sympathy—for love. I wanted to be caressed, to be told I was loved, over and over until I was sure of it. I was often even in those first days of my married love, chased by the fear that I was not loved because Everett so charily expressed his feeling for me. He wasn't as demonstrative as Father was with Mother, and they had been married more than twenty years.

Everett often talked over my head. He said things I did not quite grasp, but I never interrupted him to ask questions. I would often have liked to, but I feared to annoy him.

That night Everett went out. I wanted to ask where he was going, but waited, thinking he would tell me. He did not, just gave me a careless kiss and said:

"Go to bed in good season."

I returned his kiss, but before I could steady my voice to speak he was gone. I wandered around forlornely for a while. Then opened the piano and played a little. Both Mrs. Gray and Hetty had gone out too, or I should have asked them to talk to me. I didn't dare go into the kitchen and talk with the cook. Everett had warned me already that his servants weren't old retainers like ours at home, and that I not only could not make as free with them, but that I must not.

Finally I went to my room and undressed. I slipped on a Kimona and sat by the window. It seemed strange that Everett should go out without telling me, his wife, where he was going. Father never did that. He used to always call to Mother if she weren't in the room and say:

"I'm going to the club for a little while, I'll be back soon"—or something like that. More and more I began to see that my husband was like Father in only one thing, his age.

I could sit still no longer, and I wandered into Everett's room. It was separated from mine by a large dressing room.

At first I walked all around just looking at things, not touching them. Then I began to handle his toilet articles, so different from the dainty, lovely set he had given me. Just plain black brushes and other articles. His ties were hung on some sort of board on the inside of the dressing room door. I never had dreamed one man had so many ties, and such lovely ones. Soft lustrous silks that I loved to let slip through my fingers.

He had several photographs on the wall. But none of them interested me particularly. But, in his top drawer, under a pile of handkerchiefs, was one of a very lovely woman who looked about 30 years old. She was exquisitely beautiful. The picture was taken in evening dress showing the dimpled shoulders and the perfectly modeled arms. Who could she be? I looked at her a long time. I must ask Everett in the morning. She probably was some relative.

I presume I should have had more pride than to have looked through my husband's things had I been older. But I was lonely, I didn't feel like reading, and I was not at all sleepy. So idly I drew out one drawer after another and looked at the contents. Such quantities of fine underwear and shirts. 'Enough to stock a store' I muttered to myself. Then, in turning up the corner of some shirts to see what was underneath, I came upon another picture. I took it out and saw it was another pose of the same woman whose picture had so interested me—also a replica of the one in my room.

FIRST SOLEMN MASS AT VERNON RIVER

On Sunday, July 13th Rev. Wilbert B. McKenzie, who was ordained to the priesthood in Charlottetown on July 6th celebrated his First Solemn Mass in St. Joachini's Church, Vernon River. Assisting him at the Alter were Rev. J. C. McDonald as Deacon, Rev. Peter F. McDonald as Sub-deacon, and Rev. James A. Murphy Master of ceremonies. An eloquent sermon, appropriate for the occasion was preached by Rev. P. F. Doyle O. P. of New York. Present in the Sanctuary were Rev. P. D. McGuigan the pastor of St. Joachini's, Rev. J. C. McMillin, Rev. G. J. McLellan and Rev's James Rooney and J. T. Valley, Ecclesiastics. An unusually large congregation were present to assist at the young priest's First Mass in his native parish. At the end of Mass the whole congregation knelt to receive the blessing of the newly—ordained priest. Father McKenzie will remain at home until the end of August when he proceeds to the West to take up his work in Vancouver Diocese.
