Farmers Attention!

Do away with dull, dangerous lamps and lanterns, and light the Farm House with Electricity.

Purchase a plant with plenty of capacity.

The Phelps Light and Power Plant has this.

It gives a light that is cheap, steady, clear and brilliant.

Twenty-five 20 Watt Lamps for six hours off the Storage Battery alone, without having to start the engine. 100 lights with the engine running.

The large capacity gives plenty of electricity, not only for lighting but for other purposes—the electric iron, a one horsepower motor, etc.

The 3 h. p. gasoline engine can be used to full capacity as an ordinary gasoline engine, for all kinds of belt driving machinery.

Buy the PHELPS and get the best.

SANDRA THE JEALOUS

By Jane Phelps

A THEATRE PARTY

CHAPTER CII.

"Everett was old." I thought as I dressed, yet he did not look old in the same way father did, although they were almost of the same age. He had the wholesome air of the city man, was always faultlessly groomed, and while dignified, was never pompous or bored appearing when out in company. At dinner I looked at him and a thrill of pride ran through me at his distinguished appearance, followed by an unaccountable wish that he were young, very young like Alice Sloane's husband, yet that he looked just as he did.

We had not been in our seats at the theatre but a few minutes when Rose nudged me:

"There's Mr. Kemp—over there in that box." Just then he caught sight of us and bowed. Everett turned to see what we were looking at, and caught him bowing. He scowling the tiniest bit, but also acknowledged Kemps greeting by a faint bow.

"I knew he would be here," Rose whispered. I couldn't see why she should be particularly flattered, because there were two lovely women in the box with him, also two men. Afterward Rose said he was alone because she couldn't be with him. I thought if such nonsense when she had only met him two or three times. But I guess she was right—after events seemed to prove her so. "Isn't he handsome?" she added.

"Yes," I replied. "Yet I like Everett's style better." Just why I should have said it I do not know—some feeling of standing up for what belongs to me probably.

"He's stunning of course for an old man, especially in evening clothes; but Mr. Kemp is my kind."

There it was again! Would Rose ever stop calling Everett an "old man?" If she only knew how I envied older women, I must tell her all about how I felt — that older women, women of Everett's age were so much more entertaining, so much more attractive, that young girls were not to be mentioned in the same class. I would tell her of Irma Barton, how jealous I had been until she had told me of Leon and of herself. Perhaps I could make Rose understand that no longer did Everett seem old to me, and that I would be delighted could I add a few years to my own age so gaining in experience.

We went directly home after the play. I thought Rose was disappointed, but paid no attention. James served us a light supper in the dining room before we retired, however.

"I would have gone to some restaurant for supper," Everett said, addressing Rose, but Sandra hasn't quite recovered, and I thought she looked tired."

"This is very nice," Rose had replied meekly.

My heart was singing for joy. Everett had thought only of me. I had looked tired so he had made his plans because of that. I didn't care now if Rose had said he looked old, or that she liked a young man better. No indeed! My husband suited me. If only I could hold him. I was so young, so ignorant of all that he knew, it seemed sometimes that I must bore him. And I had once heard him say he could not endure a person who bored him.

Then, after we had bidden Rose good night and were talking over the play, one of his emotional surprises came again to me. He caught me in his arms and held me so closely that I was almost breathless.

"Tell me you love me," he said tensely, "better than anything in the world—even if I am so much older. Tell me, Sandra!" His eyes were glowing, and he kissed me again and again. He was in a mood I did not understand, perhaps because he so seldom gave voice to his feeling — any feeling for me.

"I do love you, Everett. Sometimes I am a little afraid of you, but I always love you. I want you to love me too—love me better than anyone in the world or—out of it."

At once he put me from him. My reference to Leon although veiled, had angered him.

"Good night, Sandra. I hope you will rest well, was my answer.

(To Be Continued)

That there is not in human nature a more odious disposition than a proneness to contempt, which is a mixture of pride and ill nature. Nor is there any which more certainly denotes a bad mind, for in a good and benign temper there can be no room for this sensation.
