THE CROSS OR PATCH FOX AND ITS VALUE

(By M. H. Bolger).

The scarcity of silver black fox pelts placed an enhanced value, intrinsically and otherwise, on same in the eyes of the world, but, the why and whence of this animal has received very little attention, even amongst the men, who were making millions from raising them in captivity, that is up to recently. However, publicity is education and as the new source of riches became known men asked questions and the answers caused surprise, which brings us to WHETHER THE BLACK OR RED FOX CAME FIRST. This, a much mooted question, bids fair to remain unanswered although the vitality of the black strain favors the dusky hue as being the first evolved. That the red is today more numerous than its relative the silver black can be accounted for through the fact that dark fur has always been sought after as against red, consequently the silver black fox has been hunted almost to the point of extinction. That black and red foxes are one family is an undisputed fact, and it is also a fact that, when red and black are mated and their progeny in-bred the black strain will predominate and the red be entirely eliminated, and to date there is no convincing evidence to show that black foxes, that are the progeny of cross or patch, ever reverted to the red strain, and this, startling fact brings us to the PATCH OR CROSS FOX AND ITS VALUE AS A BREEDER OF SILVER BLACKS. To invest fifteen thousand ($15,000.) dollars in one pair of silver black foxes and receive a return of 100 per cent. is like finding money, but to invest $15,000 in say eight pairs of patch foxes and secure a return of 100 per cent. is using brains, not only in safeguarding the investment by greater numbers, but establishing a basis upon which to build, a basis that increases in value in proportion to numbers. Patch or cross foxes afford then the following advantages over silver black foxes:—

1st. By affording not only the ownership of a larger number of foxes for money invested, but the greater number acts as an insurance against possible accidents.

2nd. By increasing rapidly through excess of numbers.

3rd. By obtaining silver black foxes without paying high prices for breeders.

4th. By the certainty of obtaining a good profit from the sale of patches, either breeders or pelts.

5th. And by the certainty of large profits from the sale of silver blacks obtained from the patch litters.

A patch or cross fox is the product of the mating of a silver black and a red but between the two the patch or cross foxes show coats that run the gamut from clear red to almost silver black, and strange as it may seem the cross or patch fox showing the greatest amount of silver black is not always the surest breeder of silver black pups as the records show that in numerous cases cross foxes practically red in color have littered one to four silver blacks every litter, proving that the black strain in crosses or patches do not always show in the fur. One notable instance in Prince Edward Island is a pair of animals that to the eye are ordinary red foxes but their litters most always consist of three splendid silver blacks and one patch. At the market last year these pups were worth $21,250. A fine return, on an investment of $2500, which is the market for a pair of ranch raised cross or patch foxes.

In addition it may be said that the cross or patch will prove of great value to the ordinary farmer, who lacking thousands necessary to purchase silver blacks, can buy patches because within financial reach: And who is in better position to make money from fur ranching than the farmer?
