THE SECOND WIFE.

They told me he had won before,
Another heart that mine,
And laid his first and deepest love
Upon an earlier shrine.

They said my spirit oft must grieve,
If I my lot would cast
With one who held so sacred still
Remembrance of the past.

I heeded not; my bark was launched
With his own life's swift tide,
And earth holds not a happier heart
Than mine—a second bride.

I know that he has loved and lost
What life may ne'er give back;
The flowers that bloomed in the freshness once
Have withered on his track.

I know that she, the angel-called,
Looks out from you blue heaven,
A watcher o'er the earth bound soul
From which her own was riven.

Together do we oft recall
This dream of other years;
Nor do I heed him less to know
He once had cause for tears.

More blest am I that it hath been
My love-appointed task,
To wake anew the "light of home"
In which his soul may bask.

PERNICIOUS FICTION.

The Puritan Recorder quotes from a Prize Essay just published by the American Female Guardian Society of New York, an article from the able pen of Rev. Samuel Harris, of Pittsfield:

The subject of fictitious reading is acquiring a grave importance. The unprecedented circulation of fiction has become one of the most inauspicious influences acting on the popular mind. In the year 1849, it was estimated that 5,500 different novels were offered for sale in this country; so that if a man were to read one every week, more than one hundred years would pass before he would be through the list. The purchasers and readers of these 5,500 novels must be counted by millions. The influence of this unparalleled amount of novel reading demands the most anxious attention. It is the design of the essay to prove that it must be disastrous.

No argument against these books can be drawn merely from the facts that they are fictitious. The parable, the fable, the allegory, the epic poem, the drama, are also fictions. Fiction is a vehicle of pure, moral, and religious instruction, and of the undefiled and ennobling creations of genius, as well as of depraved sentiments.

Nor is it possible to establish a criterion, by which always and infallibly to distinguish pernicious fiction from the harmless, otherwise than we distinguish the pernicious from the harmless in other kinds of composition. Fictitious works must be judged by the sentiments which they teach and the influences which they exert on their readers.

But to range through all the classes of fiction for the purpose of showing, on this principle, what is pernicious in each, would lead to indefiniteness and confusion. The modern novel, however, whether in the bound volume, the pamphlet, the magazine or the newspaper, has characteristics so marked that it needs no description, and presents a definite topic for discussion. Novels also compose the great mass of fiction actually in circulation. To these, therefore, for the sake of distinctness and precision, the discussion will be confined. Substantially similar arguments will be applicable to pernicious fiction of every other class.

And even here there is no need of sweeping assertions. Some novels are stamped with genius and pure moral sentiment. But we must look at the effect of books considered as a whole, by the character and influence of the vast majority actually in circulation; and, thus judged, novels must be characterized as pernicious fiction. We ask the attention of reflecting minds, and especially of those who read, publish, or sell these works to a candid investigation of the justice of this charge.

GOOD AND BAD LUCK.

Luck here as well as any where, impart the secret of what is called good and bad luck. There are men who supposing providence to have an implacable spite against them, bemoan it in the poverty of a wretched old age, the misfortunes of their lives. Luck for ever run against them, and for ever. One, who is good profession, lost his luck in the river, where he idled away his time a fishing, when he should have been in the office. Another with a good trade perpetually burnt up his luck with a hot temper, which provoked all his employers to leave him. Another with a lucrative business, lost his luck by amazing diligence at every thing but his business. Another who steadily follows his trade, as steadily followed his bottle. Another, who was honest, and constant to work, erred by perpetual misjudgements—he lacked discretion. Hundreds lose their luck by endorsing, by sanguine speculation, by trusting fraudulent men, and by dishonest gains. A man never has good luck who who has a bad wife. I never new an early rising, hard working, prudent man, careful of his earnings, and strictly honest, who complained of bad luck.

A good character, good habits, and iron industry, are impregnable to the assaults of all the ill luck, that fools ever dreamed of. But when I see a tatter-de-million creeping out of a tavern late in the evening, with his hands stuck in pockets, the rim of his hat turned up, and the crown knocked in, I know he has had bad luck—for the worst of all luck is to be a sluggard, a knave, or a tippler.

TESTIMONY TO THE WORTH OF THE POOR.—I have many times observed and conversed with enough of eminent and splendidly cultivated minds, too in my time; but I assure you I have heard higher sentiments from the lips of poor, uneducated men and women, when enduring the spirit of severe but gentle heaviness, under difficulties and afflictions, or speaking their simple thoughts as to circumstances in the lot of friends and neighbors, than I ever met with out of the pages of the Bible.—[W. Scott.

A western editor says a child was run over by a wagon three years old, cross-eyed, with pantaleets on, which never spoke afterwards.
