PREMIER BOND AND HIS TREATY.

Premier the Hon. Robert Bond is one of the most forceful and tactful of public men that Newfoundland has yet produced. He is yet comparatively young for the prominence which he has attained, being about forty five years of age. His father was a merchant in St. John's; he wes bred to the legal profession but left it to enter politics. At twenty-five years of age in 1882 he was elected to the Newfoundland Assembly. Three years later he was chosen Speaker of that body. In the following year, 1886, on the retirement of Sir William Whiteway Mr. Bond became came leader of his party. On the return of Sir William to politics Mr. Bond entered his cabinet as Colonial Secretary. In 1890 he was one of three delegates sent to England relative to the French Shore question and the same year he was appointed by the Newfoundland and Imperial Governments to visit Washington and undertake the negotiation of a reciprocity treaty, in which he succeeded beyond all expectation.

At that time Lord Knutsford was Colonial Secretary of Great Britain, Sir John Macdonald Premier of Canada and the late James G. Blaine Secretary of State for the United States. As already intimated it was not expected in England or in Canada that Mr. Bond would succeed in his mission to Washington but he had been so resolute and aggressive in regard to the French Shore question while in England that Lord Knutsford was only too glad to have the Newfoundlander's energies diverted to another enterprise. But at Washington assisted by the British Embassy, Mr. Bond created a very favorable impression. He found the officials there disposed to treat Newfoundland in the most friendly spirit, possibly with some sinister desire of preventing the union of the Ancient Colony with the Dominion and certainly with the desire of retaining and increasing the American hold upon the great and valuable fisheries of which the Island is the centre.

The result was the Blaine—Bond treaty of reciprocity, which may be roughly stated to follow mainly the lines of the famous Reciprocity Treaty of 1854-65 between the United States and Canada. Besides other important concession on both sides the Americans were to get practically free fishing in Newfoundland waters and Newfoundland was to get a free market for her fish and fish products in the United States. The Canadian Government of that time became alarmed and protested against the ratification of the treaty. The Imperial Government gave heed to the protest and Lord Knutsford retired from the Cabinet. So to this day the famous treaty remain a dead letter. It seems to be generally conceded that the treaty would have been a good thing for Newfoundland, but a bad thing for Canadian and Imperial interests. At all events the Newfoundlanders thought it would be a good thing for them to have the treaty go into operation and were proportionately incensed against the Canadian Government for preventing its ratification.

In 1892 Mr. Bond, with three other Newfoundland delegates was sent to Halifax there to confer with the representatives of the Canadian Government on the fisheries and reciprocity questions and other matters of difference between Canada and Newfoundland. But the mission resulted in failure. The Canadian Government would not withdraw its objections to the Bond-Blaine treaty unless like concessions were made by the United States to Canada to those made to Newfoundland. Terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada were sugggested, but Mr. Bond and his co-delegates were in no mood for union. Two or three years later, having failed to secure the ratification of his treaty, Mr. Bond and other delegates came to Ottawa in 1895 to talk over possible terms of union with a committee of the Canadian Cabinet, but again they failed to agree.

Now Mr. Bond is Premier of his Province and has set out again for Washington, it is said with authority to negotiate a renewal of the treaty of 1890 if it can be obtained. As he is fresh from the great Colonial Conference, where all these matters were doubtless talked over, the natural inference is that the Canadian Ministers have consented to waive their objections to the treaty, with or without some compensating concessions from Newfoundland, or otherwise that the Imperial Government has decided to overrule the Canadian objections and to ratify such a treaty as Newfoundland may be able to obtain. No doubt the inside history of the matter will be disclosed when our Parliament meets, if not before. Mr. Bond is understood to be opposed to union with Canada, mainly because of Canadian opposition to his famous treaty. It remains to be seen what success he will meet with at Washington and what effect his success or non-success there will have upon the future relations of the Dominion and the Ancient Colony.

"There is no grinding of the poor, there are no sweat-shops here, and the millionaire is rarer than the ourang outang."—The Patriot.

Regarding the above deliverance it may be observed that millionaires are not infrequent visitors to the Island and occasionally some of their number become residents for months at a time. If they are still rarer than the members of the ourang outang tribe on the Island, it follows that there must be a number of the latter here as well. If so, their exact location has not been hitherto generally made known. Has the Patriot a menagerie in the Cameron Block?
