JUST A GIRL

BY JANE PHELPS

A MOTOR RIDE.

Chapter 139

"It is still early, not much after 8, and a wonderful night. What do you think of a spin along the shore drive?" Mr. Claxton asked, looking not at me, but at Mother. "It would be delightful!" she returned with enthusiasm, while Aunt Susan looked her pleasure. "Then away we go!" "Come, then," I said to Mother, who looked rather dubious about leaving the dinner table in such a disarray. "We can do the dishes when we return, or in the morning." "Excuse me—I didn't think"—Mr. Claxton was embarrassed. He had evidently forgotten that we were poor people, and did our own work. "It is all right. Murry, Mother, and get your wraps," I urged. Mr. Claxton assisted Mother and Aunt Susan into the tonneau, me into the seat beside him. He was driving his own car. As we rode swiftly along the shore of the lake Aunt Susan's enthusiasm knew no bounds. It was her first view of the city at night. And she asked many questions, so that we talked very little. But I had a feeling of happiness, of security as I looked at the strong face of the man beside me—a feeling of pride as I noted his gentle way with Aunt Susan and Mother. "How many employers would be so kind?" I asked myself when, after an hour, we turned back toward home. Now Mother and Aunt Susan were quietly happy, and we talked together in low tones—not about our work, but about music and the new plays. He had a box at the opera and said he couldn't use it on a certain night. "Do you think your Aunt and Mother would enjoy Mary Garden?" he asked. "I am certain you will." "Mother is very fond of music, and as to Aunt, she will be entertained in watching the house whether she cares for the opera or not. I have not heard Mary Garden, and so shall have a double treat," I added rather primly. "I would like to thank him just as I would Mary and Tom when they did something for me, but couldn't. There was always a bit of stiffness—a feeling that he was my employer—although I knew he was also my friend. There had been no word spoken that showed he cared particularly for me, but when he left us at the apartment I had a feeling that he still thought of me as he once had—that had it not been for what I had told him of Kenneth Lawrence, he might have shown me more plainly that I was more to him than an ordinary employee. I blushed crimson at the thought, thankful for the darkness that hid my face from Mother and Aunt Susan. We cleared the table and tidied the apartment, but all the time I had a guilty feeling. I had been almost untrue to Kenneth! I had not once thought of him the entire evening, and I had allowed foolish thoughts of Frank Claxton to enter my mind. I told Mother about the box at the opera. She and Aunt were both delighted at the prospect of hearing Garden. Right here, late as it was, Mother commenced to plan what I should wear. She and Aunt Susan would both wear black, but I must have something gay and girlish. "Well look through your trunk tomorrow, Zen," Mother said. "Perhaps I can fix up one of your old party dresses. I have some good old lace, you know." So they planned for me, the dears, while I thought more of the man whose kindness made it possible for us to go, than I did of going. And at the same time I had a remorseful attitude toward the man who had gone back to his ranch to wait for me—for my answer. Before I retired I wrote Kenneth a short note. I felt I owed it to him after my long happy evening with another man. Tomorrow—Aunt Susan's Love Letters.
