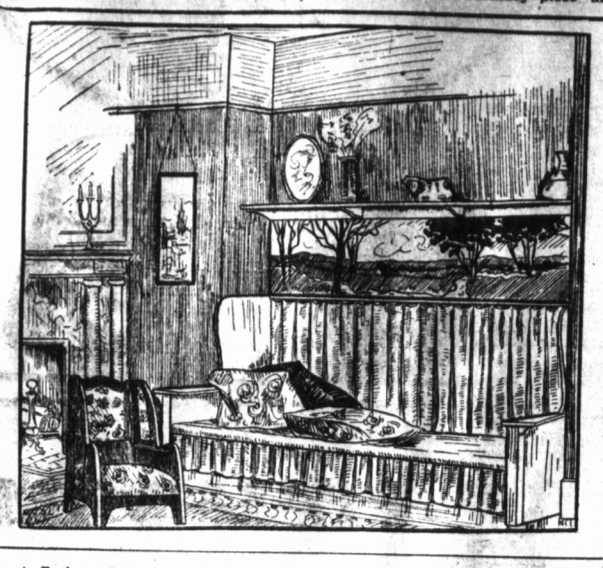
THE CORNER OF A ROOM

Although summer furnishings are undoubtedly attractive, most rooms look better when fitted for the cold weather season, as the draperies, portieres, window curtains and such hangings which, are abolished during the heated term, add much to the coziness of the average apartment.

Much care and a clever eye in selecting colors are necessary when choosing drapery stuffs, but within the last few years very artistic fabrics for such uses are to be found, even among very inexpensive materials. The plain tone material in soft green, crimson or any of the lighter shades which will harmonize with the color of the room have much to recommend them, and are, as a rule, better in effect in most rooms than are hangings that are more conspicuous in pattern.

In the room from which the sketch shown on this page was taken the hangings were all of green raw silk, these silk hangings being used on the wooden divan, which was built to fill in a corner of the room. The drawing shows the most attractive spot in a particularly pretty and original room. Often in a great many rooms there is an awkward break along the side wall, caused by the jutting out of the chimney piece and mantle shelf. In this living room this wall space was transformed by the clever arrangement shown. The woodwork of the room was all in a cream-white, the walls being hung in green canvas cloth, the drop ceiling being done in a light yellowish ecru. The settle, which was made by order by a carpenter, was a little over two and one-half feet wide, with a length of about six or seven feet. Underneath the divan a set of drawers was built in, in which magazines and periodicals could be stored. These drawers were hidden by a box-plaited ruffle of the green silk. The sides of the divan were shaped like a wing chair, and the arms were wide and solidly built.



The wall space back of the divan was protected by a hanging of the green silk also, just above this curtain one of the new landscape friezes being set in with most artistic effect. A narrow shelf in white wood topped this frieze, this shelf being placed at the same height as the tops of the built-in bookshelves which were used in other parts of the room.

The divan was fitted with a thick, well-made cushion mattress, covered to match the curtains, and several silk and embroidered sofa pillows in various gay colorings of old rose, soft crimson, yellow, golden-brown and green gave added comfort. One or two pieces of polished brass or pottery were placed on the shelf extension in this corner, and the pictures, which were mostly water colors or photographs, were framed in black or brown wood, with a few done in French gilt or mahogany.

The floor was of polished wood, over the surface of which one large rug and several smaller ones were laid, and the chairs were of mahogany, with one or two odd pieces of black oak, the odd little chairs shown in the drawing being of bird's-eye maple, stained a soft, dark green.
