THIS PROVERB

Unto those who talk and talk
This proverb should appeal:
The steam that blows the whistle
Will never turn the wheel.

"I started to tell my wife about a woman who started to make her own gown."

"Well?"

"She capped my story with one about a man who made a million dollars."

"Let me see, your boy is a sophomore now, isn't he."

"No. He's only one of the sons."

"Do you remember that young lady who was rescued by that handsome young man last summer?"

"Yes, it was quite a romance. And what was the sequel?"

"Oh, they were married, and she just lived him for nine months."

Teacher: "Now Tommy, would it be possible for your father to walk round the earth?"

Tommy: "No, because he fell down yesterday and hurt his leg."

The Old Order Changes

By

He observed the dainty neatness of her attire, the feet shod in grey suede corresponding to the colour of her gown, the mauve ribbon on her shady hat, even the sheen of the hair under its brim. And he found the vision good; Mary, though wondering a little at the intentness of his gaze, continued to smile.

"I was just going; I never am in a hurry these days. There are not so many now until I see this dear place no more."

The Canon did not seek to hide his dismay.

"Oh, come, Miss Freeland, never is a long while! Even if you persist in your determination to leave us, surely you will sometimes return to the the scene of your happy endeavours."

It was a formal speech, but it rang true, and brought a stinging moisture to the eyes of the schoolmistress.

"I am sure revisiting is a mistake, andi it would fill me with unholy rage to see anybody else in my place here, so I won't come, thank you very much."

"If you feel it so keenly, why leave us?' asked the Canon bluntly. "It will be bad news for the entire village. Have you told the children?"

"No, and I'm not going to. I couldn't bear it at all, not that, and as the holidays intervene they will have had time to forget me."

"Impossible!" murmured the Canon emphatically. "I wish I could think so; but there are no very long memories, even in Mardocks."

"Your decision is quite irrevocable, then? I am on my way to take tea with Mrs. Manning now. Can't I carry a gleam of hope with me to her? It would make her happy, I'm sure."

Mary shook her head.

"If it were only my decision it would never have been taken. But, you see, my people are leaving Basingfold. I think I told you that—"

"You did, without mentioning their destination."

"It is a place called Gorham, about eleven miles on the other side of Basingfold. Do you know it?"

The Canon shook his head.

"I am comparatively a stranger in these parts—I'm a north countryman."

"But you love dear Mardocks, too?" asked Mary suddenly.

A queer twisted smile revealed more than the Canon intended, to a very observant watcher.

"It has served its purpose, which was the restoration of my health. I ought to be girding my loins, too. No doubt you are pointing the way."

"But how sad for poor Mardocks, and for the new Squire! Oh, I think you must stay to help him, and in vulgar parlance show him the ropes, Canon Severne."

He shrugged his shoulders. "Mr. Disney will do that, but I think our good friend Mrs. Manning will be adequate to the task."

"No, no!" cried Mary, protesting. "She will give him wrong or, at least, partial views of the situation, and the people! She sees them through quite the most limited spectacles. They are human beings, Canon, same as you and I and other people."

She spoke with a kind of impassioned, though quite earnestness. Once more the Canon was struck by the shrewdness and fearlessness of her judgment.

If he is not able to see beyond the limited vision presented by others, dear Miss Freeland, then the last state of Mardocks will be worse than its first."

This speech delighted Mary. She could have danced over it. "I made sure you saw things. How proper and guarded we have always been here. How I wish I'd known you saw things like that. But I suppose I ought to have known! I have lived in a state of revolt for five years, absolute raging revolt, and have managed to camouflage it. Think of the effort required. I am exhauted by it!"

There is no sign of exhaution visible."

"It is there all the same."

"Have you no interest, or even curiosity, to see Mardocks under a new rule? It will be a different rule —I am sure."

"Oh, of course, that is inevitable; there could not be two Mrs. Mannings. Don't think I am unconscious of her beneficence and all that, but is bondage all the same. Mardocks is in bondage—I pray for its emancipation, for they are dear people, and in spite of the assumption of their 'betters' some of them are quite intelligent."

There was more than raillery; there was deep-seated resentment underlying her words.

"They had to sit tight and suffer various kinds of small tyranny because they belong here, and have no wish to transfer themselves to strange areas."

"That is true, but this discussion—though immensely interesting—"

"It isn't a discussion," said Mary quickly. "Only the schoolmarm airing her views. You haven't contributed anything. You are far too wise. I am sure it is time I retired from Mardocks. I might possibly complicate life for the new Squire."

"That, indeed, is quite possible," the Canon conceded, though Mary was not aware that his words had quite another significance. "If you will permit me to dwell a minute longer on the personal note—Why are your people leaving Basingfold? Is your father retiring from business?"

"No, extending it. We've waxed fat in the war," said Mary, with a curious inner note of bitterness in her voice. "If you knew my father you would acquit him of deliberate profiterring. He simply hasn't been able to help himself. Do you happen to know Coppetts Mill, where we live?"

"I have never seen it, but if I have your permission it would give me great pleasure to make its acquaintance before I leave Little Heath."

Mary nodded in her most friendly fashion. "It would be very nice to see you, and to hear Mardocks news. I shan't dare to cycle out here for ever so long after I really go—it would hurt too much. Will you really come, Canon Severene?"

"I will indeed, it will give me the greatest pleasure," he responded with the utmost readiness, a slight flush rising to his lean face.

But for Mary Freeland, the least vain and self-conscious of women, it had no significance at all.

"You'll rather like Coppetts. It's very old and quant, the house is hopelessly ugly, but we've always lived there. We were all born there."

Overjoyed By Sargon Result

"For four years my stomach was terribly disordered; I was nervous and restless and my back ached almost continually. Neuritis—like pains in my fingers hurt me terribly; I was badly constipated and generally rundown. Sargon 'saved the day' for me and I'm simply overjoyed at the results it gave me. My appetite is good; I sleep fine; my nerves are stronger and my backaches and the neuritis pains are fast disappearing.

"Sargon Pills toned up my liver and for the first time in years I'm perfectly regulated."—Mrs. G. Rolffe, 31 Kane Place, Halifax, N. S.
