AUCTION SALE

On Monday, first day of May, 1922, at 2 o'clock p. m., I will offer for sale at public auction to the highest bidder, farm, consisting of 92 acres of freehold property situated at Little Sands, Kings' Co. Said farm is in high state of cultivation and the soil cannot be surpassed on the Island. On the place is a good 8-room house, two barns and outbuildings, fine grove sheltering buildings on the north; never flowing well of pure water adjacent to house, other well between buildings and shore line; also stream of fresh water traversing place back of buildings. Literally alive with smelts three months of year, also good trout fishing. This place is a beautiful location, fine view overlooking the Straits. Can see Pictou Island in the distance, mouth of Pictou Harbor, Carribou Light, Wood Island light. The farm gets into the salt water where the fishing is unexcelled, comprising herring, mackerel, cod haddock, hake and lobster. This is a chance to get a beautiful home, grand place for old station, hotel or road house. At same date will be sold household goods, furniture, stove and other articles.

The Wall Flower

BY MARION RUBINCAM

A BROKEN HEART

Chapter 25

So it happened that the reward of Pandora's shy little devotion, her tender bit of idealism, was a broken heart. It never had occurred to her that Gladys was not seriously in love with Morton.

She had common sense enough to see, as the weeks of Spring went by, that Gladys, first of all, intended to take Morton away from her, and appropriate him for herself. She thought for awhile, that once Gladys was sure of Morton's attention, she would drop him as lightly as she dropped Jessie, as she had "dropped" half a dozen boys before that. Gladys was anything but constant to her affections. She tired of one boy easily and wanted another to amuse her.

Morton was devoted now, outwardly, at least, so Gladys should have been satisfied. In fact, Dora was rather waiting for the 19 year old girl's interest to slacken.

"She can't really like him," she told herself more than once.

Then that Sunday afternoon in May she sat near her window, and saw Gladys and Morton coming down the hill. Her room, at the back, looked past the barns and outhouses up the winding lane that led back through the fields and over Knob Hill. She could see, from her high position, the two figures descending the hill toward the lane. She could see them hand in hand.

That was not surprising in Gladys, but it was in Morton. At the least, it showed a degree of intimacy which she never suspected.

She thought perhaps, she shouldn't watch them; it seemed like spying. They were not in view from any but the upstairs back window—her room and her father's next to it, a tree cut off the view from all the other back rooms. Yet she did watch as they came down the lane and saw Gladys stop once where some bushes and a twist in the lane made a shelter and turn towards Morton. She could see their heads only—close together—then she slipped down to the floor, so as not to see and hid her face in her hands against the seat of a chair.

"It is serious—or he wouldn't have kissed her. He is in love with her," she said to herself.

But she wouldn't believe it, because she did not want to.

Yet the truth forced itself upon her. The windows were all open, of course the kitchen or kitchens for Aunt Maude liked to work in vast spaces—was under her room. Farm life centres in the kitchen, one or more members of the family are sure to be there.

As the two approached the house, Dora could hear their voices. Then she heard Gadys cry.

"Mother! Mother, guess what! We're engaged."

She must have been just outside the kitchen door and Aunt Maude with it, for she heard the older woman's voice the more clearly—

"Declare to heaven! You don't mean it! You children! Do you know what you're doing? Peter, Peter! Come here, what do you—"

The voice receded again as Aunt Maude went into the house in search of her husband.

Then there was confused voices and someone called.

"Grandma! Grandma, come down—"

Her own name was called too. Snatches of laughter came to her. Some cousins were visiting for the day, a great many voices made a confusion of sound in the "parlour" on the floor below.

Meantime, she had stood up, in the centre of the room, one hand held tightly over her mouth.

"It is true," her mind said. And her mind contradicted.

"It can't be."

She must have stood there, rigid, the hand pressed over her mouth, for quite 15 minutes—long enough for the hubbub of voices to die down to excited conversation.

"Dora where are you?" her Aunt's voice came again.

Then she moved, she jumped to the door and turned the key, and then went over to the bed and threw herself on it, her face buried in one of the pillows.

She wasn't crying, she was saying over and over to herself, "What shall I do now? Oh, what shal, I do?"

Her aunt came to her room to find out the trouble, and she had to explain that she was tired, but would be up to help with the supper. The occasion was being celebrated with some of the famous Nicholson "rasberry vinegar" and cake, the cousins were driving off. Some of the refreshments were sent up to her and she refused them. Over and over she whispered,

"What shall I do now? What shall I do?"

Then her father came up and she unfastened the door. He held a large kitchen cup of strong tea in his hand—black, bitter, but hot.

"Good for a headache," he said and she drank it because of his thoughtfulness in making it, and the excuse he provided for her dead white face and her absence.

But she had to go down and face them! That was almost the hardest of all.
