"The present day flapper doesn't marry until she finds a shootable husband."

"So Peckly has gone into nervous prostration as to where to spend his vacation?"
"Yes, and on top of that his wife gave him a piece of lavender dress goods to match. That was his finish!"

"Don't you think you and I could manage to go through life together smoothly?"
"Depends on what make of motor car you buy me."

"Yonder yacht is flying a flag of distress."
"What does the signal?"

The Old Order Changes

By DAVID LYALL

"You will have to wait till Mrs. Manning leaves Mardocks. It would kill her," said Mary on the spur of the moment. "She hates anything to be touched or changed. She is the living embodiment of the old order."

"Which is going—it must go if Mardocks is its fruit," said Manning. "Don't get up yet, unless I am keeping you too long?"

"I have been late every night in getting home, and my people don't like it."

"I don't expect they do. Please tell them from me, to-night, not to judge you to Mardocks. It needs you and possibly will not be able to carry on without you. I want to talk more about the housing problem."

"The Vicar is the man you ought to see. There isn't anything about Mardocks he doesn't know. You see, the people love him and talk freely to him."

"Doesn't he champion their cause, then?" asked Manning interestedly.

The question showed how difficult, almost impossible, he found it to realize the feudal conditions existing in Mardocks. He had come from a great wide land, where his job was the administration of justice to elemental peoples. He had carried with him the traditions and the practice of British justice and fair play, which is everywhere in the wide world acknowledged to be the best, and now, here, in the depths of the green English country, he discovered injustice and tyranny of the most flagrant kind, all the more objectionable and criminal in that the administration was handled with a velvet glove.

When Mary began to button up her raincoat, he, too, rose somewhat heavily from his chair. He had the air of an oppressed man, tinged with the inward determination to throw off the yoke.

"I will see the Vicar perhaps to-day. Would I be likely to find him in town?"

"Probably about tea-time. Yes, I think you would."

"And you have promised not to desert Mardocks, Miss Freeland? I shall need allies in the new crusade."

From all I can learn you would be the safest and the most popular." She smiled a little, her colour heightened, and her face became very sweet.

"I brought love to Mardocks, Major Manning. It is so simple if you set the right way about to get on with people. They don't ask much after all—I mean simple people like the villagers here," she added hastily, the complications of her own life rising up before her. "It is peace to live they want, and that, after all, is the first essential of happiness, isn't it?"

Manning did not answer, but his eyes dwelt with singular intenceness on her face. Mary shook hands hastily and left the school, pausing at the Miles's house to ask her to lock up. She lingered just a moment talking to Mrs. Miles, and when she turned to the roadway with her bicycle Manning was still waiting.

"You ride all the way to Basingstoke?"

"Basingfold," corrected Mary with a smile.

"So it is. Well, you have ridden to and fro in all weathers, all the time you have taught here. Did you get me that?"

"In all weathers," answered Mary proudly. "And have never missed a day."

"A splendid record which ought to spur the lazybones. But you have a very beautiful bicycle, you know. It must be a pleasure to ride it."

"It was a new one at Easter; cost twenty-two pounds. Prices have soared so terribly."

"But one must have good tools. I'm particularly interested in the bicycle, thinking what I could have accomplished with it in Rhodesia. I had a ninety-eight model, tied up in parts with string. One that I took devious journeys into the interior in the administration of British justice. It wasn't calculated to strike either terror or respect into the native mind."

"The administrator would doubtless do that," came spontaneously from Mary's lips, then she coloured again, almost agast at the intimacy of their talk. She felt as if she had always known him, as if he had belonged to her through all time, though he had only just arrived.

It was a sensation sufficient to slightly unsteady the nerve with which she usually rode through the crowded streets of Basingfold.

Manning, totally unconscious that a good many village eyes were watching him, stood still, looking after the light receding figure skimming like a bird on her beautiful machine along the white road, and then, with a scarcely perceptible sigh, turned about lit a cigarette, and walked through the village towards the Vicarage.

He was disappointed, however, in seeing Disney, who was reported by the charwoman who answered his knock to be not at home. Coming out of the Vicarage gate he encountered another clerical figure on a bicycle easily recognizable as Canon Severn, whom he had met at the Hall on the day of his arrival.

They stopped by mutual consent, and the Canon alighted and, wheeling his machine, came forward with outstretched hand.

"I am on my way to the Hall—a note came by hand from Mrs. Manning this morning. Aren't you coming back to ten?"

Never before could you give so much that cost so little!

J. MILTON WHEATLEY

"Oh, is it tea-time? Why, so it is, twenty minutes to five o'clock. I wanted to see the Vicar of Mardocks. I don't have any luck in finding him at home."

"He's a conscientious visitor, and there is some summer sickness about, I believe," said the Canon. "But as he seldom leaves the parish, you will probably see plenty of him yet. An excellent fellow—most conscientious, painstaking and hard-working. He deserves a better living, but unfortunately the tendency is for increases to decrease instead of increasing. Well, and how are you settling in?"

The Canon regarded the virile figure with the strongest liking and approbation. He had taken to him at first sight, and the note he had received from Mrs. Manning at noon had somewhat puzzled him. She said in it that she needed his advice, and the suggestion was that she was troubled about several things.
