Jaques Cartier (Continued from Page 4)

the winter of 1535-1536 the year of the second voyage when winter quarters were established at the present site of Quebec City. Cartier's captain "seeing the plight we were in and how general the disease had become, gave orders for all to pray. . . . He issued an order that on the following Sunday mass should be said at that spot, to which all who could walk, should make their way in a procession, singing the seven psalms of David with the Litany, praying the Virgin to be good enough to ask her dear Son to have pity upon us."

At Mount Royal.

When Jacques Cartier and a party of his men proceeded up the St. Lawrence River in the autumn of 1535 and arrived at the Indian village of Hochélega, at the foot of Mount Royal, the aborigines brought their blind, aged, infirm and sick companions before the Captain of the party in order that he might lay his hands upon them. And the Captain "seeing the suffering of these people and their faith, read aloud the Gospel of St. John, making the sign of the cross over the poor sick people, praying God to give them knowledge of our holy faith and of our Saviour's passion, and grace to obtain baptism and redemption. Then the Captain took out a prayer-book and read out word for word, the Passion of Our Lord."

The narrative of Jacques Cartier's voyages contain ample evidence of his profound spirituality, of his earnest desire to convert the pagan Indians. His relations reveal to an equal degree his unconquerable faith in the tremendous potentialities of the land he had discovered. His relations reflect his unbounded enthusiasm in the Canada to be the fertility of its soil, its vast untouched natural resources. In this respect, Cartier was probably the greatest propagandist, the most eloquent "publicity agent" this country ever had in the Old World.

Cartier was the first white man to grasp the possibilities of the great empire covering the northern half of the Western Continent. Let us pause and hearken to his description of Prince Edward Island which he visited in the course of his first voyage: "The soil where there are no trees is also very rich and is covered with peas, white and red gooseberry bushes, strawberries, raspberries and wild oats like rye, which one would say had been sown there and tilled. It is the best tempered region one can possibly see. . . ."

Sees Vast New Country.

Journeying up the St. Lawrence River, Jacques Cartier views with amazement the vast stretches of fine rolling country extending along both shores and notes in his narrative: "We had sight of the finest and most beautiful land it is possible to see, being level as a pond and covered with the most magnificent trees in the world. The whole country is as fine a land as ever one beheld. This river is the richest in every kind of fish that any one remembers having seen or heard."

The commemoration of the fourth centenary of the discovery of Canada should be above all of a religious character. Jacques Cartier was the first herald of the teachings of Christianity on Canadian soil. He never lost sight of this primary aim of his voyages—that of evangelizing the natives of the new world. He was the first to establish the religious tradition in Canada, and though other discoverers and pioneers followed, such as Champlain, the founder of Quebec, they only follow in his footsteps. This point has been well brought out by a master of French literature, M. Georges Goyau, in his "Origines religieuses."

But where should this proposed festival of the fourth centenary of Canada be held? Undoubtedly at that place where the discovery, properly speaking, of Canada, was made, that is at Gaspé. That is where Jacques Cartier took possession of the soil of Canada in the name of the King of France. On this Gaspé coast he spent nearly a whole month. Besides, does not Gaspé offer all that is necessary to attract on such an occasion the thousands of pilgrims who would come from all parts of Canada, the United States, France and even England, to join in the celebration of an anniversary that would be not alone religious and national in character, but would also take on an international aspect.

And would it not be extremely appropriate that the celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of Canada reflect in some enduring manner the tribute of a grateful people to the memory of one of the greatest discoverers of all time? And what tribute could be more expressive of a nation's gratitude to the first pioneer, the premier trail-blazer on Canadian soil, than the erection of a memorial cathedral on the very spot where Jacques Cartier planted the great cross of discovery and salvation in July, 1534.

A Worthy Anniversary.

Five years do not constitute too long a period in which to prepare and organize this commemoration, whose splendour and magnificence should be in keeping with the event it is to recall. Let us impart to this tentative project the character of a national undertaking. Let every national and historical society, the universities, colleges, schools, Canadian clubs, service clubs, the religious bodies and entire clergy collaborate in carrying to fruition a project that should appeal strongly to all who appreciate the historical significance of the anniversary to be commemorated. No doubt the different provincial Governments of Canada will join spontaneously into the movement. England, France especially, and the United States, will also answer the call.

1934! Only five years hence, and this great anniversary will be a fact. We should therefore set ourselves to work at once. The celebration should be thoroughly representative of the spirit of the Canadian people. The press can give a splendid impetus to the project by informing public opinion, disseminating the glory of the illustrious mariner of St. Malo, whose life and achievements have been chronicled not only by French writers but by English writers also. To those who desire a deeper insight into

BRITAIN'S LOSING BATTLE (British United Press)

LONDON, Oct. 1.—Day by day the sea is devouring English soil. Recently 40,000 tons of cliff collapsed near Mundley, Norfolk, and a corn field which had just been harrowed disappeared. In the past thirty-five years nearly 1,000 acres, or ten square miles of land have been lost to the sea.

Houses, churches and inns that stood on the land are now the abode of fish. At the present time the village of Pakefield in Suffolk, which has lost 250 feet of land during the last twenty-five years, is threatened with total destruction. Dunwich, near by, was once a great sea port and a cathedral city; but its glories are now fathoms deep. Now the 13th century church at Pakefield may share the same fate.

"This part of the coast is very subject to erosion," explained an official of the Geological Society, "and the sea is not depositing the eroded material further along the coast, as it does in some parts of the country.

"In East Yorkshire, on the other hand, a strip of land forty miles long and four miles broad has been eaten away between Spurn Point and Flamborough Head, but much of this material has been deposited again at Spurn."

But England is not likely to disappear. According to the report of the Royal Commission on Coast Erosion, issued in 1911, more land has been gained through natural accretion and artificial reclamation than has been lost through erosion by the sea. Against the 6,440 acres lost in thirty-five years, 48,000 acres have been deposited. If Peter is being robbed, Paul is being repaid with interest. But this fact is not likely to afford much consolation to Peter, when he sees his home falling into the sea.
