CHAPTER XI

Bradford did not return to Markyate-at-Stone within the next few days, nor did he write. A soldier on leave is freer than most men, and the opportunity which is part of the devil's spawn of war is ever at his elbow.

He can invent and pass on, if so minded, a thousand and one excuses for dereliction from duty, apart from his military duty, which does not coincide with his inclination. None can absolutely prove that he has told a lie. The poor old War Office, scapegoat for a thousand sins of omission and commission, is nevertheless guiltless of a heavy part of the obligations fathered upon it by men who have had to cover up tracks.

Bradford's family, however, did not worry for the first week, at least, about his absence nor his failure to write. He had often kept them anxious when he was on the fighting front, quelling that anxiety at last by the time-worn formula that he had been too busy to write. Love makes no such excuse. When the heart is really bound by strong ties of affection, writing is not only a duty, but a joy.

Then suppose that he was waiting on the mysterious, mythical Board which has decided so many fates. But as the second week began to lengthen to a close they felt anxiously increasing. Happening to be in the bank one day concerning a big balance he wanted to invest in War Loan, Isaac Bradford mentioned to his old friend, Ellis Hayward, that he had not heard from Jim since he went to London.

"What did he go up for?" asked the banker bluntly, looking up from his desk with a queer expression in his keen grey eyes. They were in the private room together, where lots of business was being done in War Bonds during these prosperous days for Markyate.

"A Medical Board. There's a restlessness on him, Ellis; he don't seem to settle anywhere. He wants to get back fighting. I suppose it's a good thing our lads feel like that, but it seems to me something's wrong with it, to turn decent lads into machines for killing other lads like themselves."

The banker made no remark for a moment, and Bradford thinking he understood, blamed himself for touching a sore spot, Hayward having lost his only son.

"Do you know where he is?" asked the banker, cautiously.

"He's living at the Automobile Officers' Club in London and I think if we don't hear to-night or to-morrow morning I'll pop up. I could be doing with a couple of days in London just now. It would clear up a lot of business matters."

Hayward hesitated no longer, but looked squarely into the face of his old friend.

"I don't know whether I ought to tell you; there can't be any harm in it I should think. Jim's not in London. He's at Eastbourne, and a week ago he drew a good bit of money out. I wondered at the time what he could possibly want with it."

Bradford looked the surprise he felt. "Jim at Eastbourne? But he doesn't know anybody there," he remarked, with the helpless air of a member in a well-regulated family suddenly confronted with some unprecedented vagary on the part of another member.

"As to that I don't know. He wrote first from the Automobile Club, and the money was sent to him there, but the acknowledgment came from Eastbourne."

Bradford looked deeply troubled. "I wonder what it can mean, Ellis? His mother is beginning to worry in earnest now. I wonder whether I should tell her or wire to the Eastbourne address?"

"But I don't know that I ought to give it to you, even if your son made no secret of it, Isaac. He wrote in quite a business-like way, and even mentioned the fact that he would not have troubled me only he didn't happen to have as much as he required lying to his account at Cox's."

"That doesn't look as if he had done anything to be ashamed of, does it, Ellis?"

"You're right. I shouldn't brood on it anyhow, old friend, and, if I might presume to advise, I'd say nothing to Mrs. Bradford yet. Probably you'll hear in a day or two. Perhaps it's only one of the war weddings that are in the air just now."

Bradford shook his head, even while he was inclined to jump at the suggestion. Fear and hatred of sin were deeply imbedded in his clean, strong nature, and underhand practices were absolutely foreign to his whole ideal and conduct of life.

Hayward regretted having mentioned the affair when he saw the gravity of his old friend's expression, and let him go with a kindly warning not to make a mountain out of what would probably prove to be a mole-hill. Fortunately, before Bradford reached his own door, he met his son-in-law Bishop returning from the post office, where he had been posting a manuscript to catch the afternoon London mail. Bishop was struck by the bloom on the old man's face.

"Hullo, sir, what's vexing you? Any word from Jim?"

"No word from him, but I've heard something about him this afternoon which has upset me. I'll walk a step with you, Tom. Mr. Hayward has just been telling me that Jim's at Eastbourne."

"At Eastbourne!" repeated Bishop, with a puzzled air. "What's he doing there?"

"Just what I'm asking, and, further Tom, he's had a good bit of money sent to him, more than he needed. I'm sure, unless there was something behind it."

"Ah!" said Bishop, and the expression of his face at once arrested Bradford's attention.

THE EAST INDIAN WOMAN

TORONTO, Ont., June 28.—(By The Canadian Press)—"No matter how beautiful the girl, no matter how well dressed, if she can write, she is not for me!" This old East Indian proverb was quoted by Dr. Trevor Davies in his address to the students of Branksome Hall as signifying the old attitude in regard to the education of women, which today was entirely changed.

An unusual feature in the prize-giving was the winning of the General Proficiency Prize by five girls. This prize is given by Dr. and Mrs. W. P. Caven in memory of their daughter Ruth. The usual medal given was this year represented by five books, one for each of the winners.
