CHAPTER 25.
VAIN SEARCH

ON the afternoon that Norma was learning from Sydney Stokes that her husband had received thirty thousand dollars from her father before proposing marriage to her, Cynthia Greer, lying on a chaise longue in her garden, was staring at her thin white hand, wasted with weeks of illness.

"They had told her only that she had had an accident while driving her car. How had it happened? she wondered. Where had it happened? They were so evasive about it—doctors and nurses, even her father and mother.

She must have been ill a very long time, she thought. The tiny circlet of diamonds on the third finger of her left hand—the guarding she had worn since her eighteenth birthday—slipped off too easily. Once it had fitted closely.

Though she didn't remember, it was the ring with which she had been married to King Carson in the early hours of that memorable May morning. When the obituary justice of the peace had held out his hand for the ring, Carson had said:

"Oh, I forgot all about the ring! Shows I'm not accustomed to getting married!"

The justice had suggested: "Any other ring will do," and Cynthia, flushing, had produced her guard-ring.

Now, as she turned and twisted the circlet on her thin finger, she tried hard to recall the circumstances of her motor crash.

"I must have been horribly frightened," she thought. "I must have had some last terrible thought when I felt myself going. What was it? What could it have been? Why can't I remember?"

But the very effort to pierce the veil that hid the past wearied her. She gave up the attempt and fell into a light slumber.

When the nurse awakened her to give her broth, Mr. Greer was sitting beside her. He looked anxious and careworn, but his eyes were unusually gentle and kind. There was a compassion in them that moved her.

"Am I mad, Daddy?" she asked him suddenly.

"Oh, my dear child, no!"

"Then why can't I remember how I came to have an accident?"

"The shock, my dear—er—everything!"

She shook her head gently.

"That doesn't seem enough. Was it night or daytime?"

"Ah—daytime," he cleared his throat awkwardly.

"But, Daddy, I drive well, you know I do," she protested. "I drive fast, but I don't take chances. How could it have happened, unless some one ran into me? Was that it?"

He took out a silk handkerchief and wiped his moist brow. He was suffering acutely. But the doctors had warned against telling her the truth suddenly. They said her memory would return in time. It would be better that way.

"There was a storm, Cynthia," he said gently. "Probably the rain obscured your wind-shield."

"Probably," she agreed thoughtfully. "And there was nothing left of my beautiful car?" she asked, with a wistful smile, after a time.

"Nothing. But I'll get you another just like it, Cynthia."

She considered this for a time, and then shook her head.

"I don't think I want another like it, Daddy," she decided gravely. "I'm afraid I'd always be thinking of the other time that I can't remember. I mustn't let it get my driving nerve, you know, Daddy," she added, with a smile.

His heart ached for her. And in the back of his mind lurked the terrible question that so tormented Cynthia's mother—where had their daughter been that fateful night? "What had happened to the proud, distracted young creature whom Major Harcourt had jilted on the eve of their wedding?"

"I'd like a car that is different in make, in color, everything," Cynthia was saying. "Will I be able to drive again soon, Daddy?"

"Very, very soon," he answered. "You're nearly recovered, Cynthia. Now be a good girl, and put all these disquieting thoughts out of your mind. Just act as though the accident never occurred. Forget all about it and begin again to be your own gay little self."

She smiled at him and touched his hand lightly with her thin fingers.

"I will, Daddy. I promise. You and Mother are so good to me. I'm afraid I've been awfully headstrong at times. I'll try to do better."

When he had gone away, she closed her eyes again, and, lulled by the fragrance of the garden and the warmth of the sunshine, she slept.

On a busy, fashionable thoroughfare, not very far away, King Carson—the man she had married and forgotten—was idling in that same brilliant sunshine, scanning with eager eyes each smart car that passed in the throng of afternoon traffic.

He couldn't fail to recognize her car, he told himself, and he would know her, because his heart would tell him when she was near.

But his search was in vain. The car he looked for did not pass.

WINNIPEG, Man., Sept. 15.—The world with sixpence to start off with!

An Irishman said it couldn't be done, so Munro MacLennan, of Aberdeen, Scotland, decided to do it on a farm near Claremont. He expected to harvest in the Saskatoon district and make enough money to buy a boat to take him as far as the coast. Munro MacLennan arrived in Winnipeg recently on a harvesters' special, his sixpence still intact, having earned a few shillings working as long as he keeps travelling west.

Roof your Buildings with BIRD'S ASPHALT Twin Shingles

Your buildings are deserving of real roof protection—the protection of Bird's Asphalt Twin Shingles. Bird's Asphalt Twin Shingles are weather-proof, fire-safe and permanent in color. Self-spacing and covering far more surface, they save time and labor in the laying. They can be put on directly over the old wood shingles, thus saving the labor and cost of removing the old roof.

A roof of Bird's Asphalt Twin Shingles will free you of repair and re-painting costs. There are three non-fading colors to choose from—Red, Green or Blue-Black.

There is a Bird dealer near you. See him or, if you do not know his name, write us.
