FORM THE TRENCHES

Mrs. Carrie Myers, Southport, has received the following letter from her husband now in France:

Have only received four letters from you since coming to France, eight weeks ago. Too bad. Have no news that I can write today. There was a lot of Canadian mail yesterday, parcels, papers, etc. Mine must have got lost, or was not sent by my good people at home, or the people out here say. Too bad about Warren getting wounded, but those things do happen out here when fellows cannot get out of the way in time.

A few of this bunch got winged but we cannot expect to fight without losing somebody.

Wishing you all the best of health and hoping for a letter or paper, or something, with love to all. Glad to see you are running in the Guardian contest, and hope the Southport people will help you along well.

France, July 19, 1916.

Dear Carrie—Received the two letters with handkerchiefs, also two postcards from your mother. Trust you are all well. Having great weather over here the past two months. Have nothing to do but work. The Battery has been very busy all the time since we came over, both day and night, "busy killing Germans, I hope." Some of this bunch got winged, as you have no doubt seen by the paper before now. I have heard that brother Warren is going to get better, and will go to England soon.

I have no news. We are, I think, in the hottest section of the British line. I have seen hundreds of German prisoners since moving to this part about four weeks ago. Bert Stewart is here and is O.K., also Jack McCarron and the rest. I was just talking to him. There were lots of parcels and mail from Canada the last week. I got some.

TRYING TO FOOL THE ROYAL NAVY

Rear Admiral Sir Dudley de Chair, K. C. B., M. V. O., gave recently an interview to The Brooklyn Eagle from which the following extracts are taken:

"Our blockade machinery took some time to get running smoothly. The British Customs officers did not slide easily into new grooves. Accustomed for years to board a ship and inquire merely for dutiable wares or spirits they were perhaps too easily satisfied when the neutral captain produced a few bottles of whisky and allowed the Customs to seal them, while all the time absolute contraband might be snugly hidden in the bottom of the hold."

With regard to devices adopted by blockade runners to elude the vigilance of our examination, I may mention some of the chief ruses:

(1) Double bottoms, decks and bulkheads, concealing guns, rifles and other firearms or ammunition.

(2) Copper keels and copper plates on sailing ships.

(3) Hollow masts.

(4) Rubber onions. These were discovered when one of our officers dropped one of the deck. The onions bounced ten feet in the air.

(5) Rubber concealed in coffee sacks.

(6) Cotton concealed in barrels of flour.

(7) Rubber honey, made in the form of honey-comb filled with a curious liquid mixture.

(8) False manifests. This is the most frequent form of faking. In several cases where the captain of the neutral realized that the game was up he produced both the genuine and the false manifests for our boarding-officers to compare: a form of frankness quite amusing.

Neutral Ships Rescued.

"On four distinct occasions which have come under our direct personal observation our blockading patrols have rescued neutral ships from imminent destruction by German torpedoes in the North Sea. The merchantmen were lowering their boats, with the submarine standing off waiting to fire. A few well-directed shots from our guns soon disposed of the menace, and the neutrals were able to rehoist their boats and proceed safely about their business."

"On another occasion we came upon a Scandinavian with masts broken off at the deck and crew lashed to the bulwarks, while heavy seas swept her from bow to stern. Our men saved the crew at some risk to their own lives and stood by until the gale abated, and then towed the wreck to a British port for assistance and repair. We towed an American ship, which had been seen drifting about helplessly for twelve days without coal or food, into a British port through the worst sort of a sea."

"Which neutral nation has been the worst offender against the British blockade?" asked The Eagle correspondent.

Cannot Name Offender.

"I could easily tell you that, but I
