ELLEN'S DIARY

May Passes Quickly With Songs From Many Robins

"The flock grows and grows! When I counted the lambs yesterday, there were...But today!" Alex's eyes were round and shining this afternoon. "I think there are-it must be five more! Let me think. Yes, there was the one born near the lane and the pair that came up by the line - fence: that's three. And two more down-not far from the first spillway in the dam: that's five. And there's sure to be more before dark!"

"The hotter the war, the sooner peace" we chuckled to ourself, recalling the philosophy our young years, who could remain calm in the midst of the busiest days of the farming, even when its concerns came fast.

"How they will play - those lambkins in the June - time! "we said... "In the evenings before they go to bed, what racing and romping there will be! We'll watch them then, won't we?"

And today a woodland thrush sang for us in first flute-like notes of the year.

"Listen!" Mack, hearing it, smiled, stopping by the door on his way to school ("Can't you think of something you want me to bring you from the store?" was his question). "Yes" he nodded satisfied "it's a thrush. Early too for them" he commented.

A pa'tridge-bird, we glimpsed today. And Granddaughter, while on an outing with Alex and Peter to drink at the spring, in the field across the creek by the roadside, found a yellow-marked warbler, and also a wild canary, among the alder bushes there.

"And robins! I never saw so many, nor such pretty ones as are around this year" se reported.

"May is slipping by, and we have no cultivating done yet" James offered at supper. "Just the fencing - that's all we're doing...and the chores, so far. And dear me, what work there is ahead!" The work, and the promise of the seedtime - the Teaching in school of nursing-the herds and flocks, once more, on the summery fields.

James' favored dish of gridded salt - cod, was his main food at supper, to be tasteful, and also a happy reminder of his mother's cooking, when his years were young. Alex, who had joined us, preferred two bantam - eggs cooked in the shell, enjoying them more than hens' eggs, doubtless because the tiny fowls in their resplendant plumage are invariably of much interest to such small ones.

"Now where shall I put this candy to save it?" he had questioned before this, bringing in a packet of sweets. He stopped in the kitchen. "No" he shook his head "a refrigerator is no place to hide things - too many looking into it" he grinned. I think I'll put them in that old vegetable dish in the dining room - cupboard" he decided. "No one will ever think of looking for them there!"

He is a strange lad among children, able to sample his sweets and then put the remainder aside for another day, even to share them their, with others, whose like supply had soon vanished.

Veiled is our moon-of-night, No frog music. No stars. We have a gentle May-night.

Until tomorrow — Dairy — Good-night...
