Canadians Take Time To Remember War Dead

By THE CANADIAN PRESS

Canadians took a moment out of the satellite age Monday to remember their war dead from other anxious times.

While the nation honored the more than 100,000 Canadians who died in two world wars and the Korean conflict, two Soviet satellites orbiting the earth reminded it of continuing international tensions.

Men across the nation said it was a high price for so little security. But in Sudbury, a cenotaph was unveiled bearing these lines by Rudyard Kipling, British author and poet.

"We, giving all, gained all. Neither lament us nor praise. Only in all things recall—it is fear not death that days."

The official government memorial service was held Monday in Confederation Square in Ottawa at 11 a.m.—the 30th anniversary of the end of the First World War.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker, wounded overseas during service with the 196th battalion in the First World War, became the first veteran prime minister to lead the nation in remembrance.

He was joined by Governor-General Massey and David L. Burgess, president of the Canadian Legion.

Mrs. Fred MacFarlane, 70, of Truro, N.S., represented Canadian mothers. She lost her first husband at Vimy Ridge in the First World War and three sons died in the Second World War.

FOLLOW CAPITAL LEAD

The pattern of the Ottawa service was followed at cenotaphs across the country.

The Canadian Legion paraded to the memorial in Halifax. In Saint John, N.B., more than 2,000 veterans marched to the cenotaph where Fisheries Minister MacLean took the salute. Brig. E. C. Brown, officer commanding the New Brunswick military area, was the speaker at the cenotaph service in Fredericton. At some points on the New Brunswick-Maine border veterans of both countries held joint observances.

At Montreal's Dominion Square, Mayor elect Senator Sarto Fournier, representatives of Lieutenant - Governor Fauteux and provincial officials joined in placing wreaths.

The lieutenant - governor himself and other provincial and municipal officials took part in a service in Quebec City Sunday, placing wreaths at the cross of sacrifice in Battlefields Park.

At Toronto Mayor Nathan Phillips and representatives of the provincial government placed wreaths at the city hall cenotaph. More than 5,000 attended.
