Marriage Scales

"HE MUST SPEAK — NOW!"

A moment later, Doris was flying down the iron stairway from the dressing rooms to the stage.

After that kiss, a kiss that had shaken her to the very soul, she had wrenched herself from Craig Cullam's arms and taken refuge in flight.

His effort to snatch her to him again, his cry of "Doris!" had lent wings to her feet and he dared not pursue lest curious eyes be watching below.

Doris didn't stop to analyze what instinct had prompted her flight. She was madly happy, tremulous with the knowledge that Craig Cullam did love her. His kiss was the most wonderful thing that had ever happened to her.

Breathing in queer, excited little gasps, she felt her way down through the semi-darkness of the wings, thankful for the gloom and the preoccupation of the actors waiting to go on. She could hear the voices of the characters on the stage and the queer hush which presages some dramatic climax in the action.

Just before she opened the narrow iron door that leads from the stage to the back of the boxes, she stopped and opening her vanity case, scanned her face in its tiny mirror.

What she saw brought a blush and an irrepressible grin.

Her face bore a tell-tale smudge of grease paint. He who ran might read, especially the sharp eyes of Enid Palmers impatiently waiting in her car out front.

When the damage was repaired and she had rejoined Miss Palmers, Doris was once again the cool, efficient, business-like young woman. Only her eyes held a new depth of happiness and there was a deep and most becoming flush in her cheeks.

"My goodness, you take a long time to get a simple sheet of music," complained Miss Palmers crossly, as she started her engine. "I was just about to come after you."

"Why didn't you?" inquired Doris, devoutly giving thanks that she hadn't.

"I told you I didn't want a beautiful illusion ruined," Miss Palmers reminded her. "It simply isn't possible for any man to be as attractive as Craig Cullam looks on stage. I'd rather keep the picture. I say, did you ask him what I told you to?"

"About the kiss?" Doris nodded, "I did. But I think it was impertinent of me. You ought to ask your own questions when they're as—er—personal as that."

"What did he say?" demanded the other girl eagerly.

Doris thought wildly for a moment. Why hadn't she foreseen this, she wondered.

"He said—" she stammered, "oh, he said—why didn't you come and find out for yourself."

"Really?" Miss Palmers chuckled, obviously pleased. "How delicious! Perhaps I will some day."

Doris smiled to herself. If Enid Palmers knew the truth! She could fairly see that young lady's somewhat "poppy" eyes, pop still further. So would the eyes of the rest of the world when they knew that Doris was in love with and loved by, an actor, and this actor of all people!

She knew now that he must speak. Whatever had caused his silence, he must, after that wonderful revealing kiss, tell her he loved her.

Doris knew the distinction between kisses. It was a knowledge intuitive in the mind, quite separate from the experience of the senses. There are the kisses of a light flirtation, the kisses of passion, and the kisses which are love, desire, respect, tenderness, and awe, rolled into one.

Craig Cullam's kiss was of this last. It had thrilled her as she had never known it was possible to be thrilled. It had frightened her with a delicious fear. And best of all, she knew that he was both thrilled and frightened too by the touch of her soft lips.

He had revealed his whole longing, tumultuous heart in that one moment. He must now tell her he loved her and ask her to be his wife, of that she was assured.

So she was very happy as she cleared away the details of her day and prepared for the week-end with Mariana. Even Dick Jervis' message to the effect that he was to be a fellow guest and would wait to drive her down that night failed to dampen her spirits. Something very sweet was singing in her heart, and she couldn't bring herself to be curt or unkind to anyone, no matter how much he bored her.

Jervis scrutinized her closely when, about that eight he brought his car around to committee headquarters. Her radiance disturbed him.

"You ought to be looking worn out after fooling all days with this confounded pageant," he grumbled. "Instead, you look like a rose."

"How funny you are, Dicky," Doris laughed happily as she settled herself beside him. "Fancy scolding me because I'm not a mere rag and a bone!"

"It isn't fair for any one girl to be so good-looking!" he announced with conviction. Thereupon he proceeded to tell her how much he loved her, ending with his oft-repeated proposal of marriage. This occupied most of the ride down to Three Oaks.

Doris scarcely heard him. She was thinking of the man she loved, picturing him in his dressing room at the theatre where he had kissed her that afternoon.

THAT CAR OF YOURS

BY HARRY E. PORTER

This is a series of articles pertaining to maintenance and repair of your Automobile. We will be glad to answer through this column, questions regarding your car or its mechanism.

Send your inquiries to "Automobiles," The Guardian Publishing Co., Ltd., Charlottetown.

The valves in your car control the gases both fresh and used, and work in conjunction with the pistons, and their timing set and retained by gears connecting shaft which operates pistons and the shaft which operates valves.

On the downward stroke of the piston the intake valve opens, which valve is connected directly with the carburetor; the suction of the piston draws the gas and air from the carburetor into the cylinder. When the piston reaches the bottom of the cylinder this valve closes and the piston travels upwards and compresses the gas. The explosion then takes place and drives the piston to the bottom when the exhaust valve connected directly to the muffler opens and the used gases are expelled.

The valves are similar to a mushroom in shape having a bevel seat which fits into a like seat on the engine.

Successful operation depends upon the valve forming a proper seating on the engine seat. Otherwise, leaks ensue.

To facilitate this, valves are ground into engine seat.

Ques.—The head lights on my Car have black circles when shining on the road. Focusing does not alter it. Is there any other way to remedy this trouble?

D. B., Charlottetown

Ans.—You will find that by changing over the bulbs or installing new ones and re-focusing it will be possible to have your head lights working properly.

DANCING PARTNERS INSURE

A partnership insurance arrangement with the two famous dancers, Adelaide and Hughes, has just been closed, by which they are protected with $50,000 life insurance each.

This safe form of protection, which is becoming very popular with the theatrical profession, was deemed necessary by these two public entertainers who conduct a large business as dancing instructors. The cash fund which would be immediately created in this transaction would be very acceptable in meeting the loss of income which would follow upon the death of either partner.
