BROADWAY AHEAD

"You have been neglecting us, Yvonne," Mrs. Ogden said, gravely, but without reproach.

"I have been very busy—with my home," Yvonne faltered.

"Yvonne, dear, we have been talking of you, I and these other two good friends, and we have come to make one more attempt to get you to go on with your dancing. I have told these gentlemen your story and they have come with me today to add their pleadings to mine. We are willing anxious if you will let us, to go to your husband ourselves and to explain to him your great gift."

"Richard is gone," Yvonne said dully.

"Gone!" the three callers echoed the word.

"Yes, last week, for three months to visit mines and talk with engineers."

"Gone and left you here alone!" Mrs. Ogden tried not to sound too indignant.

"I wished to stay," Yvonne said, defending Richard. "I am not afraid and I am very happy here by myself. See, Richard gave me this little dog before he left." She held Dicky up to be admired.

Mrs. Ogden cast a significant look at the two men. "Suppose I ask these two good friends of yours to leave now, and you and I have a little talk, Yvonne. They had simply come to urge on you the acceptance of the contract offered you two weeks ago. They wanted your permission to speak to Mr. Ross, if necessary. But now that he is gone, they cannot of course, see him."

"And I hope to see you soon on Broadway," Mr. Drake said, shaking hands heartily.

Left alone the two women smiled at each other, and then Yvonne was in her friend's arms sobbing as though her heart were broken. Mrs. Ogden led her to the davenport and sat beside her, soothing her and waiting for the wilder sobbing to cease.

"There, there, child," she kept saying. "Everything is going to be all right. There, there." Dicky jumped up beside them and nuzzled against Yvonne, who presently cuddled him in her lap and dried her tears.

"Now, then," said Mrs. Ogden briskly. "Tell me all about it."

"There is so little to tell. Richard wasn't feeling well and needed a rest. So he went to Denver and will be gone three months. He offered to send me home to France or to have a woman to stay with me. But I preferred to be alone."

"He didn't offer to take you with him, though," Mrs. Ogden said shrewdly.

"No," Yvonne answered sadly. "And he never will. He does not want me changed. If he knew what I had done he would never forgive me. As long as I am the Yvonne he married he will be faithful to me, and will notice me now and then. For the new Yvonne he would have no use at all."

"You may be right, Yvonne—but what of yourself? Can you stand living here this way, buried, starved, year after year?"

Yvonne shrugged.

"If you will do this," Mrs. Ogden said, "Richard's absence creates a wonderful opportunity for you. You can sign a contract to appear in this new show of Mr. Drake's for three months and at the end of that time leave and return to your old life."

Yvonne considered.

"You need not leave this house unless you wish," Mrs. Ogden went on. "I have an old Negro maid I can send over to you. She will do the housework and keep your clothes in order and be company for you, too. Come, Yvonne, snatch this piece of life. It belongs to you. Richard is enjoying himself, depend upon that."

"You are a marvel," he declared. "Now for real work."

The rest of the afternoon flew by. Mrs. Ogden and Mr. Drake were deep in consultation over costumes. Several times they came in to watch Yvonne working with M. Romanevski. Mr. Drake was well satisfied with what he saw and left late in the afternoon to begin his advertising campaign.

The ballet master and Mrs. Ogden stood talking while Yvonne dressed. "And will she return to her stupid clod of a husband at the end of three months?" he asked.

"It is hard to say. She may become so enthralled by the life she will lead as a great dancer that she will be able to put him out of her life, and she may not. Don't forget that she loves him with all the devotion of a singularly pure and warm-hearted girl. He is the only man she has ever known outside of her native village friends and he appears very wonderful to her."

"If she is the artist she will give him up—without one regret," M. Romanevski blew an imaginary piece of thistle from his hand as he spoke.

"If she is the artist she will feel more deeply than the rest of us," Mrs. Ogden corrected.

"Perhaps you are right, madame," said the master with a sigh.

The following day Yvonne had her first rehearsal on the stage. It seemed an immense affair to her, and the black, empty auditorium beyond seemed to yawn in her face in-

"DANCES BY MADEMOISELLE"

A swift thought of Anne Lovelace stabbed Yvonne. She knew the idea was preposterous, but none the less it influenced her decision.

"If you are sure I can dance just for the time Richard is away, and then return to my house, I will do it."

"Of course you can," Mrs. Ogden cried. "Oh, Yvonne, you will never regret this. Come, we must go at once to the studio."

M. Romanevski knew the battle was won when he saw Yvonne and Mrs. Ogden coming in the door.

"She will dance—the angel!" he cried, seizing Yvonne's hands and kissing her on both cheeks. "Come, to practice. You have but three days in which to be ready, costumes, dances, everything."

Mr. Drake was more practical. He led Yvonne to the small office and pulled out contracts. Yvonne was not without practical shrewdness. Mr. Drake wanted to have the contracts read for appearances three months, daily, except Sunday, from that day.

"But no," said Yvonne. "Supposing my husband returns before that time. No, it must read thus, 'Contracts to appear daily save Sunday until the return of her husband, Mr. Richard Ross!'"

"That's the craziest clause I ever put in a contract," Mr. Drake grumbled. But he put it in, and Yvonne read it slowly and nodded her head over it.

Then there was the matter of a name. M. Romanevski wanted her billed as "an angel." Mrs. Ogden suggested that she appear on the program as "Yvonne." Mr. Drake suggested Tonette. But Yvonne herself settled the question firmly.

"I shall appear simply as Mademoiselle. That will preserve my identity and furnish thought for those who may be interested in my dancing."

"The girl's right," Mr. Drake declared. "People love a mystery and I'll make the most of this one." He wrote in a large firm hand. "Dances by Mademoiselle."

"And now for rehearsals!" cried the ballet master. "I hope you are not too stiff, Mademoiselle."

"I have been working too hard to be stiff," Yvonne said, laughing. "I cleaned my great beast of a house all this week and stooping and twisting and reaching and bending, all those are necessary—in house cleaning as in dancing."

M. Romanevski put her through some simple exercises, then the more difficult ones. She followed easily, enjoying his amazement that she had not fallen back noticeably in her work.

"You are a marvel," he declared. "Now for real work."
