Seek Answer To Gaudy Color Of Deep Sea Fish

NAPLES, Oct. 16.—The Hartman Deep Sea expedition, which has arrived here to undertake exploration of ocean depths never hitherto reached, will begin its work with a series of studies in deep sea fishes, aiming at the solving of certain scientific puzzles connected with the currently accepted theories of evolution. Why are deep-sea fish brilliantly colored? Will be one of the principal questions to be answered in these initial studies.

At the present time, science is unable to account for the phenomenon of brightly colored fish and other multi-hued creatures inhabiting these remote regions of eternal darkness. The existence of such vari-colored life in the lower strata of the ocean seems contradictory to the evolutionary theory which explains the coloring of different forms of life by the effect of adaptation to environment and the survival of certain species through protective coloring.

STUDY OF SUNLIGHT Under the guidance of two prominent European scientists, Professor Von Stubbberg and Dr. Ludwig Brühl of the Institute of Marine Biology, University of Berlin, the American expedition will undertake to provide adequate data for the study of this problem. In various sections of the Mediterranean, deep sea life will be observed and photographed at depths up to half a mile with the Hartman motion picture camera, and exclusive data will be collected as to how far sunlight, passing through various colored filters, will penetrate into the abyssal depth of the sea.

The possibility that certain light rays which are invisible to the human eye may penetrate easily through water will be tested through use of specially-constructed super-sensitized photographic plates. The Hartman expedition left New York in August. It plans to revolutionize deep sea exploration by the use of a driving cylinder through which ocean depth up to 15,000 feet can be explored and studied. During the early stages of the work, however, no depths greater than 3,000 feet will be attempted.

"I do not take his remarks as a slur on Italy or as being said with the intention of casting a slur."

In his speech at the annual conference of the Conservative party at Brighton last Thursday, Premier Baldwin said: "I have been told that the country wants a Mussolini, but the English will never tolerate a dictator.
