FRED'S FUTURE

Jerry found Mr. Terry comfortably established in his sitting room, a bottle of old Bourbon and a siphon on a table at his elbow.

"I have to warm my old bones after a day like today," he said genially, motioning Jerry to a chair.

It's a lot colder here than it is in South America right now," Jerry answered for lack of something to say.

"I don't doubt it; don't doubt it at all. Well, young man, you've done a fine piece of work. I'm proud of you, and I'm only sorry things aren't going as smoothly between you and Constance. That's what you wanted to talk to me about, I suppose."

"Partly, sir. And partly about something else. Constance doesn't want to marry me now, you know."

"So she tells me. She's discovered after all these years that it's young Clayton she wants. I don't interfere with Constance's happiness, Jerry. And I don't mind telling you frankly that I regard Clayton as a far better match for her—not just in social and financial ways, but because temperamentally they're better suited. Connie loves to run things. She's my daughter. And Clayton is used to yielding to her."

"I left them together in the library just now. I want Connie to be happy too, you know. But what I mostly want to talk to you about is how much money I owe you."

"Money? You owe me?"

"Yes, sir. I want to know how much the flight of the Golden Girl cost. I kept track of expenses pretty well until the last few days, then we went pretty much haywire over last minute preparations. I want to know just how much it is altogether."

"Why?" "I want to pay it back. There's my share of the prize money and there are some other things I can do to get my share of the expense together."

Mr. Terry laughed. "You're being very amusing, Corbett. You couldn't pay that money back to me if you tried all year. I've had more than $100,000 worth of fun out of it. So has Connie. On the practical side I really owe you money. The success of your trip sent air stocks higher than the Golden Girl flew herself. I cleaned up half a million on my air holdings, and I regard them as on a more substantial basis than they have ever been before."

Jerry's relief showed in his face. "When you put it that way—" he began.

"I do us it that way. Don't say another word to me about paying back a penny of what it cost to equip the Golden Girl. Now there's another thing. Clayton tells me this invention of Mr. Harper's has got a real future. I think you and your buddy, France, are the fellows to push it. I'm willing to put some money in it, and I suggest we organize a company with you, France and Clayton as the active organizers and workers and me as the chief backer to get the thing on the market."

"It's mighty good of you to include me, sir, but I don't believe I can give up flying. I'm first and last a pilot, and I won't ever be much else, but Fred ought to jump at the chance."

"Let's have him up." Fred joined them a few minutes, looking far better than when the Golden Girl had started.

Mr. Terry explained the matter under discussion. "You're the man with the most practical experience, since our friend Jerry wants to stick to flying, you ought to be the president of the corporation, let Clayton act as treasurer under my direction, and with certain shares of stock allotted to Miss Harper, who will control the patent rights, we'll soon be ready to go."

"That's sounds fine," Fred said. "I'm out of the active flying ranks from now on anyway, and there's nothing I'd like better than developing something in the aviation line."

They talked a little longer, Jerry fidgeting on his chair, impatient to find So-so. It seemed an age before Mr. Terry dismissed them, after appointing an hour for a conference the following day. Jerry drew a long breath as he left the room.

"Free, white an twenty-one," he said to Fred. "Connie's given me the gate, fellow—you've given So-so the gate—and now I'm off to see if we can't console each other."

"Good luck." Fred's tone was hearty and he himself was surprised at how little troubled he felt at this conclusive sign of So-so's loss. Henceforth his life would be bound up in the progress of a great enterprise. In time he would forget that he had spent years wishing for the moon.

"Good luck," he said again, and turned aside.

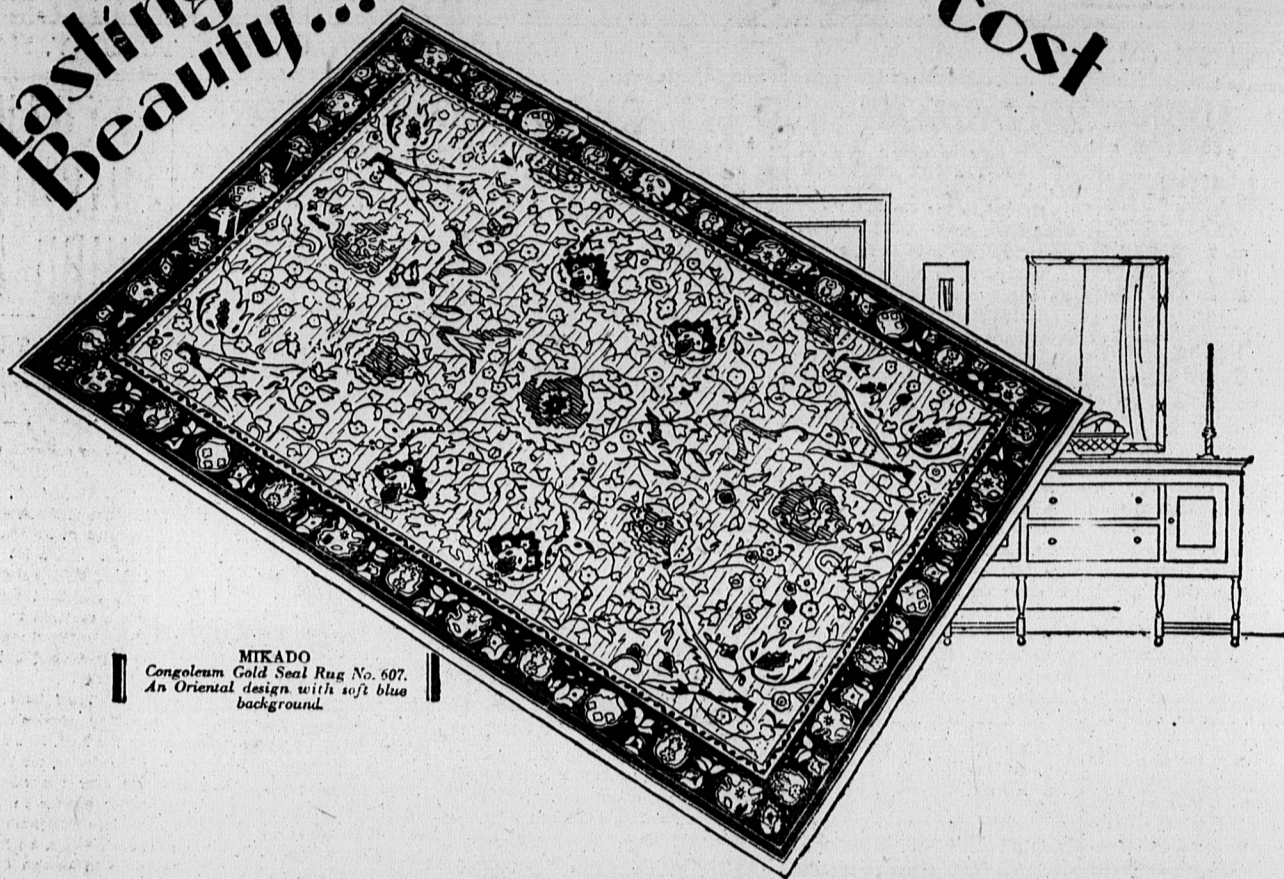

Jerry knocked at So-so's room. No answer. He opened it a trifle and peered in. It was empty.

"Looking for So-so?" Connie called up to him.

"I am."

"She's gone out to the Crownest Empire Day" and is not a public holiday.

"I see no rift whatever in any corner of the Empire," the minister declared in the course of his speech. Sir William said he did not know where in any part of the world could be found an advance comparable to the enormous advance Canada had made not only in Agriculture but in the production of manufactured goods.

"The idea that immigration detracts from the amount of work to go round is a hallucination and the notion that increased population restricts the output is ridiculous," he declared. "It would indeed be disastrous for the empire and, I think, for the world, if public opinion which up to the present has been completely for the empire, were to break away in any of the great dominions and if they were to form—as, of course might be possible—a Dominion contrary to the interests of the other portions of the empire."

"The empire is not merely a privilege but a responsibility to the world at large, and so long as we recognize this there is no fear of the empire," Empire celebrations of a non-partizan character on May 24 have of late years grown generally popular in Britain. Many schools parade and salute the flag and hear addresses by some local personage.

A monster demonstration in Hyde Park, this evening was addressed by Premier Stanley Baldwin. Music was led by the massed bands of the Guards and the Union Jack and other empire flags were hoisted in the presence of a great multitude. Several pensioners from Chelsea whose personal experience of fighting goes back to the times when wars were less mechanical were present. Boy Scout, Girl Guides and Naval Cadets were there in thousands.
