The Red Lamp

Mary Roberts Rhinehart (Continued)

Up to-day, but not allowed out of my room. Jock spends most of his time with me, whether from devotion or interest in the appetizing trays Jane sends up, I am slightly uncertain. Edith suspects the latter, and has taken to calling him old dog Tray. She reproaches me bitterly for my faculty of getting myself into difficult situations, and quoted to me to-day those immortal words of Lewis Carroll, with a small amendment of her own: "You are old, Father William," his young niece said. "And your hair has become very white. "And yet you incessantly stand on your head. "Do you think, at your age, it is right?"

In preparation for the detective's visit she has laid out my silk pajamas, and her reason for doing so sounds like her: "No man is really at his best without his trousers," she observed. "But there's a sort of moral support about silk pajamas. It puts you out of the house-breaking class, anyhow."

"Not at all," I retorted. "Only our best house-breakers can afford them, these days." "But it shows her strength and my weakness, that I am now wearing them."

Greenough has come and gone. What he thinks of things now I cannot say, but at least I am, as I have had occasion more than once to record here, still at liberty. The fact that the revolver I used was Halliday's, and Halliday's supporting statement, no doubt are in my favor.

At the same time, it is clear that, although he listened carefully to my preliminary statement relative to our suspicions against Gordon, he was not greatly impressed by it. He said to me, "I don't suppose you accuse him of that, too?" "I've told you, I said impatiently, "that we haven't a case; it's a theory. That's all. Take for instance that rope."

"Oh, come now, Mr. Porter! I've slipped out of my room at night over a wood-shed; so have you, probably."

Coming down to the night of the 11th, he listened to my written statement without comment, save that he smiled somewhat over what he called my "ingenious conclusion." He also passed lightly over Halliday's entrance of Bethel brought down and sitting huddled in a chair in the library, somewhat dazed and showing signs of collapse. And of Gordon's return and of our sudden realization of my predicament.

"Just what predicament?" "I was in the house because I knew Gordon had a rope and a knife in his room. If we let him up there, and he did away with them, it left me in pretty poor shape."

"So you kept him downstairs?" "By force," he says. "I wouldn't call it force. But we were three to his one, of course."

"In other words, you telephoned to the doctor, but you didn't telephone to Starr until Gordon came in and found you there."

"If you want to put it that way, yes."

"You broke into the house and found somebody there who had no business there. But you didn't think of calling on the police."

"What I felt we needed was not a policeman, but a medium."

trying to intimate? I had to get out again. He abandoned that for the time. "The point is this, Mr. Porter," he said. "You and Halliday have laid considerable emphasis on the fact. It was because Gordon had told you that you were in the house, I understand."

"Had it and might use it," I amended. "It was, in your opinion, either on him or in the room upstairs. But as it turned out it was neither on him nor in his room. He denies ever owning such a knife."

"Halliday saw it. He's lying." "It's your belief, then, that on this murderous errand of his, which was to end up at the house, he disposed of the very weapon which you had expected him to use?"

"I haven't said that, but I think it probable." "Why? Why should he? He could have had no idea the house was to be entered, or his room searched. He came back, smoking a cigarette, I understand, and found you and Halliday in the hall, finding a window broken and a bullet wound in the floor. That doesn't sound like a man who has been out hiding the evidences of his crimes."

He asked me abruptly after that how long I had known Halliday, and his relationship to the family. Then he attacked Halliday's statement that he thought he had seen the lights of a car by Robinson's Point, and had started for that.

"Mr. Halliday," he said, "says that he believed that the car was giving you alone; that the found no car there, and turned back. To support this statement, he says that a boat, lying in the creek there, had excited his suspicions because the oar-locks were wrapped in muffled things."

"The position of the boat was suspicious," he said. "But that was matter for me to determine, not Mr. Halliday. As to the strips he maintains were wrapped around the oar-locks, I am not saying they were not there; but, I am saying that they were gone when I went over the next morning to examine the boat."

What he had hoped to gain by that I do not know. He shifted rapidly, perhaps in the hope of somehow trapping me; our reasons for hoping to connect Gordon with the crime, since one of them had taken place before his arrival; when I had first missed my fountain pen; exactly where I was standing when the revolver was fired; when I had taken off the safety catch; where I was when Halliday broke the window. And from that, without a pause, back to the gun room window and had me repeat my story about finding it open, and entering by it.

"Yet you thought," he said, "that this boy, whom you consider a degenerate and a murderer, was inside. In a few minutes you expected Halliday back, but you did not wait for him. Is that right?"

"Then you thought, in all probability, that the boy had this knife with him."

Town Criers In Competition

LONDON, Eng., Oct. 15.—The cables recently carried a brief story of the national town crier championship contest in the little Wiltshire town of Pewsey, where there were 24 competitors, Ernest Austin of Highworth, Wiltshire as the inner of the championship. Following is the Times' account of the "crying match."

Pewsey rang with stentorian cries at the National town criers' contest. It was claimed for some of the competitors that their voices could be heard for miles. The programme of the event stated that one competitor was reputed to have a "seven-mile voice." But the competition demanded more than an effort to life the voice over Salisbury Plain, below the north-east ridge of which the contest was held. The efficient town crier must proclaim his message clearly and with expression. And so the criers gave a demonstration of their artistic methods in voice production as well as in the use of their bells.

There were 24 competitors from nearly a dozen counties. The dialects of the north were missing. Wales was represented but the majority of the criers came from towns in the south and west of England. A prize was offered for the best dressed crier, and the company of competitors in their full regalia, some in velvets and silks, made a display of the Merchant Tailors' Federation.

The criers were dressed in accordance with modern styles, but the majority were suggestive of the picturesque designs of past centuries. One crier for example wore an ancient gown adorned with a monster silver badge, and there were several competitors in bright colored suits with knicker-bockers and silk stockings. Their parade in the Market-place where they assembled fully equipped with their bells, showed that in some towns the crier must be an ornament in any civic procession. They marched from the market-place to the sports field, where the contest was held.

The criers' competition was only one item in a long programme of events in the annual carnival at Pewsey, which is organized for the benefit of the Savernake Hospital and the sick and needy. There were bicycle races and a military display of non-commissioned officers and men of the 1st Battalion Wiltshire Regiment.

But the outstanding feature of the afternoon was the contest of the criers. They proclaimed their message from a small platform erected in the centre of the enclosure, which was surrounded by spectators. The judges were; J. St. Hart, director of the education of the British Broadcasting Company and Rev. E. S. Daubney, rector of Pewsey. They retired into a small tent situated about 80 yards from the criers' platform, and there they recorded their marks in accordance with the merits of the competitors. The following was the test piece for each crier: "Oyez! Oyez!! Oyez!!!"

"Fused at Pewsey and District Carnival: the biggest and brightest spectacle in the South and West of England where a week of revelry and pageantry reigns supreme, and a procession of stupendous proportions passes through scenes of fairland amidst a blaze of brilliant illuminations: a revival of the time-honoured town crying the means of announcing Royal Proclamations, the earliest advertising medium and the original form of broadcasting."

Starr followed by Gordon, Halliday and Doctor Hayward, went upstairs to examine Gordon's room. During the interval of waiting for the constabulary to be summoned of an approaching nervous chill, the beginning of the illness which laid me up for the following three days.

"Gordon was as surprised as I was," he says, "when Starr didn't find the knife. It was too good to be true; he could hardly believe it."

Points of importance in the contest were, of course audibility, clearness of speech, accuracy in reading, and expression. The competition, as may be imagined, produced a variety of methods, not only of reading but of ringing the crier's bell. The full text was not always given accurately. The words "A procession of stupendous proportions" occasionally marred the flow of the message from the lips of the crier. But the intelligence with which the text piece was given, in many cases in clear penetrating tones, showed that the efficiency of the town crier and the strength of his voice are being well maintained.

The first prize and the championship were won by Ernest Austin, of Highworth, Wilts.
