GOOD-GROOMING TIPS

Clean Hairline — A clear, definite hairline is an asset that is marred by even a touch of powder or cream. So before you leave the dressing table, use a small, stiff brush to remove every trace from the hair.

Hand-saver — When you wash your hands, take an extra half-minute to rinse them thoroughly. Soap left on the skin is the cause of much hand chapping.

Children should have their first smallpox vaccination before their first birthday, according to an eminent physician.

"WE'LL DINE IN THE CABIN"

"Now, he went on, 'I'm going to carry you over the rough ground whether you like it or not. You hold the torches and we'll be back again in no time. It's not really very far to the beach from here. I explored the place pretty thoroughly this afternoon. Feel cold?"

"Not now," she owned. "You're quite sure you're all right?"

"Of course I am," he told her. "I'm jolly hungry though, and I'll bet you are, too. Hope they've left us some dinner."

During the return journey Stephen chatted lightly and inconsequentially, and it was not long before the lights of the yacht came into view.

"Here we are," he commented. "another three hundred yards and we're back home."

Moyna Winstanley did not reply. She was sorry the return journey had been so brief. It had seemed so much longer when she had set out to find Stephen. More than that, she didn't want to return to the people on the yacht. She wanted Stephen Hyton for herself. It didn't matter that she went without dinner. She knew she would go anywhere with Stephen so long as they were alone together.

"I can walk from here," she told him, as they descended to the beach. "Thank you for carrying me."

Stephen set her down lightly. "There," he said, "not far now, and I'm certainly not charging for any dinner tonight. If Sir Timothy doesn't like the way I'm dressed I'll have dinner in my cabin."

"If you do can I join you?" There was an eagerness in her voice that surprised Stephen.

"Why of course. What a jolly idea. You go ahead to your cabin while I see about having dinner brought down."

At the head of the gangway he watched her run lightly along the deck and smiled happily to himself. She was a strange little creature and needed a lot of thinking over.

Stephen turned to descend to the saloon in search of Ventress. A chatter of voices floated up to him—ripples of laughter, and it struck him as being rather odd at that moment.

At the door of the saloon he paused. A woman was coming through leaning on a man's arm. The man was Claude Greatr. The woman he didn't recognize for the moment. Then, with a stab of amazement he saw that it was Lady Kitty, but a different Lady Kitty from the woman he had known.

"Hello, Stephen," she called to him, "wherever have you been. We were getting quite worried about you, weren't we Claude?"

Stephen stood staring, wondering whether he was hearing aright, wondering whether he was seeing aright, too.

Lady Kitty saw the look of surprise on the young man's face and her glance hardened.

"I must have fallen asleep on the island," stammered Stephen. "That's all — nothing to worry about."

They swept past Stephen towards the staircase, and as Lady Kitty passed him he saw her face more clearly. Saw the shadowed eyes, the cammed lips, the dress.

Just then Ventress emerged and greeted him warmly.

"What have you been up to?" he demanded. The Captain spoke banteringly, but when he saw the look in Stephen Hyton's eyes he laid a hand on the young man's shoulders. "That's all right, my lad, I understand."

"I don't think you do," confessed Stephen bitterly. "I came to about having dinner in my cabin, but I'm not so sure now whether I'd not rather be sick instead."

CHAPTER XIII

DINNER FOR TWO

Stephen Hyton and Moyna Winstanley dined together that evening in the somewhat cramped confinement of Stephen's cabin. For Stephen, however, the meal was not a conspicuous success. It had been spoiled to a considerable extent by his recent encounter with Lady Kitty.

Moyna had noticed Stephen's preoccupation during the meal, but she had refrained from commenting upon it until they sat for a little while smoking over their coffee.

"You seem worried. What's the matter?" The girl's words were intended to be casual, but all the same Stephen detected the deep hint of concern in them.

"Nothing really," he responded. "I had a bit of a shock before dinner and I'm afraid... Oh, hang it, I don't know why I should be worrying about it like this!"

The girl in the chair opposite to him regarded Stephen with quiet, thoughtful eyes.

"I thought, perhaps," she ventured skilfully, "that it might be the effect of your adventure this afternoon."

"I wish it had been," he said, bitterly.

"Can I help you, Mr Hyton?" The question was asked with an almost juvenile naturalness that for the moment caused him to start in the midst of his semi-dreaming.

"You?" he questioned, puzzled. "How can you help when you don't know what the ailment happens to be."

For a second a flash of pain shot through the girl's eyes and Hyton noticed it. "I'm sorry," he apologized, swiftly. "I shouldn't have said that. You'll think I'm not for me, and I wouldn't like you to think that I haven't forgotten what happened a few hours ago, either. Only a woman like you could have done what you did."

A warm glow of happiness replaced the look of pain that had been in the girl's eyes a moment ago.

There was a silence for a moment, then she said:
