The legends of the East hold many amazing tales of miracles and romance . . . but none more enthralling than the magical tale of a vagabond street singer and the Sultan's daughter, "A Thousand and One Nights," Columbia Pictures' Technicolor extravaganza currently featuring Cornel Wilde, Evelyn Keyes, Phil Silvers and Edele Jergens at the Prince Edward Theare.

It's the story of Aladdin and his wonderful vamp . . . the Genie with the light brown hair and is lush with magnificent settings . . . music . . . romance . . . harem houris . . . lovely slave girls . . . luscious beauties . . . comedy and swordplay.

Looking Ahead In Ottawa

By The Ottawa Staff of the Canadian Press

OTTAWA, Oct. 1 — (CP) —Developments are shaping towards the calling of an international trade conference some time next year.

The meeting would be called under the auspices of the United Nations and its purposes would be to draft a multilateral trade agreement aimed at reducing barriers to trade, quotas, embargoes, tariffs and other restrictions as well as to establish an international body to supervise the operation of the treaty and serve as a clearing house for information

Talks now being conducted by Lord Keynes, economic adviser to the British Government at Washington, began on a financial basis but are likely to broaden into a discussion of commercial policy. That is likely to continue for some time and to involve an exchange of viewpoint which may lead to some understanding between Britain and the United States on the way in which those two countries would approach the projected conference

Members: Private members of the Commons again are to have a day especially set aside for them to discuss the problems of their own constituency and constituents

The practice of having a "private members' day" was done away during the war because of the urgency of other business to be handled. Now with the return of peace, the privilege is being restored and Mondays have been designated as the day when the private member on any side of the House will be able to draw attention to any particular problem he has in mind

When John Bracken, Progressive Conservative leader, asked Friday if it was the Government's intention to dispense with private members day today (Monday) he was told by Veterans Minister Mackenzie that it was not the Government's intention.

If the day had been dispensed with, the House would have continued debate on the Government's War Expenditures and Demobilization Bill.

Aviation: The recent exhibition flight of the big Lockheed Constellation air liner in Canada was for the purpose of trying to interest Trans-Canada Air Line officials in the purchase of several of these planes both for domestic and international services, it was reliably learned

It was learned that Lockheed officials have told T C A. about the number of the big ships already on order to big rival trans-continental and trans-ocean services and have used as a talking point the superior speed of the Constellation in comparison with any other commercial plane immediately available.

With T.C.A planning services to Europe and to Asia, India and Australia, the speed of competitive services will be a serious consideration in any aircraft order given from the Winnipeg head office.

THE KIRK PULPIT

Preaching last evening on the text "Take heed that you despise not one of these little ones" (St. Matthew 18:10), the minister, the Rev. T.H.B. Somers, said: "Of course we must distinguish this despising from what I might call the passion of noble scorn. A man is a poor creature and a poorer Christian, if he has lost his capacity for scorn. There are deeds that a right - thinking man will scorn to do. There are books that an earnest heart will scorn to read. And there are men and women whom a Christ-touched soul would scorn to number in its list of friends. A man is out of line with Christ who cannot kindle into scorn of anything. For if ever in the world there was the passion of scorn, it was in the heart of Jesus in the Temple, when he raised His whip and drove the cheaters out. Such scorn as that is a very holy thing. It is the kindling of a man's best into a flame. It is all that is purest and most divine within us raised to white-heat by intolerable evil. And a man must be very lukewarm for the right, and have sadly confused weakness with charity, who is never stirred so in a world like this.

But to despise is something very different. There is nothing of moral passion in despising. It does not spring from any love of goodness. It is not rooted in any hate of wrong. True scorn is an utterly self-forgetful thing. But the man who despises is always full of self. And I think it is not difficult to see the evil that is wrought by that spirit of contempt. It was as the champion of the weak and the oppressed and that they might have an atmosphere to grow in that our Lord spoke so sternly of despising. It is easy to be good when we are loved. It is not very easy to play the man when we are hated. But to be courteous, charitable, gentle, loving, kind, when all the time we know we are despised is a task that would try the powers of an angel. There is nothing so likely to make another despicable, as just to let him see that you despise him. There is nothing so certain to touch the flowers with frost-bite, and chill the air, and make the spirit bitter. And I think that our Lord hated contempt, and banished it imperiously from the kingdom, that chilled and suppressed hearts might have a chance. There is only one thing worse than being despised by others. And that is to be despised by one's own self.

Escape From Heartbreak

By Margaretta Brucker

theless, she wondered whether this news was true, whether Duke had less influence than he claimed

"Storm Kane?" she repeated.

"You heard me! And that reminds me to tell you something else for your own good. I might have told you before, but I hadn't the heart. Now I think it's time you were told. Know why Terry took a shine to you and started playing around with you?"

Valerie didn't answer. What was Dot going to say now? She felt she couldn't stand much more of this sort of talk.

"He wanted to get the low-down on a small-town girl in a big city —wanted to use you in his play!"

Valerie's eyes widened. "His—his what?"

"His play—Angel Face! The one that's now making a hit for Storm Kane. He wrote it under a pseudonym.

Valerie sank down on the couch. Terry's play! So that's why he wanted it to have a long run! But was that the only reason? Had he—had he written it especially for Storm?

"Terry had always wanted to write a play," Dot went on. "Back in the days when he and my ex-husband palled around together, he was always talking about writing one. Now, he's done it. And now you know the reason for his interest in you. He modeled his heroine after you."

Valerie straightened up. "If he did, I'm glad I could be of some use to him," she said stiffly. "I don't know why you should think I'd mind. Terry has been a good friend and I'm grateful to him for his kindness but, aside from that, he means nothing to me. All that matters to me right now is my career."

"Well, don't count on Duke Max-well to start you on it. He'll do for you what he did for me—nothing!"

"I have no intention of counting on him," Valerie snapped. "If I can't win out on my own, I'll—I'll —well I'll go back to working as a store clerk! I don't need pull to sell zippers and buttons!"

Dot eyed her shrewdly. "Maybe I've shot my mouth off too much—or maybe I haven't. I just didn't want you to make a sap of yourself—over either Terry or Duke." She turned into her room.

After she was gone, Valerie went to a window and stood staring out into the darkness. What Dot had said about Duke didn't matter. But Terry. . . . Terry.

Was it true that he had been kind to her only for a selfish purpose? She couldn't bear the thought, but she had a terrible feeling that Dot was right

She had hoped that the pin he gave her for Christmas meant that he loved her as she loved him, but now . . . now . . . Perhaps it was only his way of thanking her for serving unwittingly as a model for his play heroine
