ANYTHING but LOVE
 by JANET DORAN

CHAPTER XXX
 Bill Sands moved cautiously out of the shadows in one corner of the laboratory.
 "Look here, Tommy," he said to Alma, "are you going to let that smooth old bandit whistle you out of this formula of yours? Don't you know that, if he'll pay two hundred thousand for it, it must be worth a lot more?"
 Alma smiled. "Do I look as if I weren't dry behind the ears yet? Roy Carryall isn't fooling your side-kick one bit, even if he does think he's pretty smart!"
 "Don't forget what he did to your Dad," Bill reminded her.
 "Do you think I'm likely to forget the single fragment of it, after I've had to see Dad a pauper—the humiliation dependent of my high-handed domineering Aunt Harriet? Have you forgotten that I closed the door on my former life and came down here to fight my way up in order to make up for what they did to him? Don't ask me what I'm going to do, Bill—I don't know myself. But don't make the mistake of thinking I've forgotten, or that I'm ever likely to forget!"
 Bill reached out a quick, friendly hand to grip one of hers. "I'm sorry," he blurted. "I guess I've pretty thick. And whatever you're got up your sleeve, I'm for you to the last grim ditch!"
 "Thanks, Bill," Alma said unsteadily. "You've been a grand friend all along!"
 He moved away hastily, as if in sudden panic, for he was afraid to turn back to her work bench. Before her mind's eye, there flashed the vision of another man voicing the same sort of loyalty and friendship—the vision of Johnny Anthon's grave face as, in a voice husky with emotion, he had said things she would never forget. "Johnny," she whispered. "Am I never going to find the way to forget you?"

 The laboratory faded away before a marching procession of memories and, in sudden panic, she grabbed her beret and jacket and started home, walking briskly in an effort to escape her thoughts.
 After supper, she slipped into her little roadster and, driving slowly down West Hills Avenue past the house that had once been home to her but was now dark and empty, she stopped before the home of Christopher Gordon, the District Attorney, climbed the steps and rang the bell.
 A pleasant-faced maid admitted her and ushered her into the living room. In a few minutes, Chris Gordon appeared, entering the room briskly.
 "How do you do, Miss Whit-taker!" He beamed, shaking hands warmly. "I've wondered how you were making out! Things any better with you now?"
 "Burntwood's a small town, Mr. Gordon. I imagine you know as much about my affairs as I do myself!"
 He laughed. "Well, I know you're been putting up a game fight—and winning points, too. I hear you've perfected some new kind of formula."
 "That's what I came to see you about," Alma said. "The company expects to buy the rights to it if the patent goes through all right, but meanwhile, I've had an offer from another quarter."
 "A rival concern?"
 "No," said Alma. "A local group of business men. They offered me two hundred thousand in stocks and the return of my old home, though they began the dicker with a flat fifty-thousand-dollar bid."
 "Carryall and his outfit?" Chris Gordon said. "Not in the name of the bank, Miss Whit-taker?"
 "That's what I want to make sure about," Alma explained. "I thought you could help me. I want to get to the bottom of this offer of Carryall's—see just what he's up to. I've a hunch there's something crooked about it. And if there is, I want to find out and expose him. And I want to find out all the ins and outs of his dealings with my father."
 "You've come to me about this at a strangely opportune moment," Chris Gordon laughed grimly. "The bank examiner was in my office this afternoon. He's got about a dozen counts against Carryall and his gang. Believe me, they're going to squirm when they're called upon to account for their high-handed juggling of the bank's affairs for their own personal gains!"
 "You mean," Alma said slowly, "that the bank is closed because 'its affairs are being investigated'?"
 "Exactly!"
 Alma sighed deeply. "Then you can help me?"
 "I most certainly can," Gordon declared emphatically. "I'm going to call in a New York lawyer to help on this. It's a case that will interest him. I'll get him on the long-distance wire right now if I can."
 He picked up the phone, asked for the toll operator, and gave her a New York number.
 "Person-to-person, call to Mr. John Anthony Payne, Jr.!"
 He turned and smiled at Alma, who had suddenly paled.

Extra Wage Compensation Announced For Employees Of General Foods

A week before Christmas all employees of General Foods who have been with the company prior to January 1, 1936 will receive an extra wage compensation of two weeks' pay, according to an announcement by R. K. McIntosh, Managing Director of General Foods Limited, Toronto.

The distribution will be made on December 17, 1936. An extra compensation of one week's pay will be given to all employees between January 1, 1936 and November 17, 1936.

These extra wage compensations affect all General Foods employees in 63 plants and sales offices in Canada and the United States. The employees receiving it participate in the manufacture and sale of such widely known food products as Jell-O, Maxwell House Coffee, Grape-Nuts, Post Toasties, Certo, Baker's Cocoa, Baker's Chocolate, Sanka Coffee, Post's Bran Flakes, Sugar-Crisp Corn Flakes, Baker's Coconut, "Grape-Nuts" Flakes, Minute Tapioca, Postum and Swans Town Cake Flour.

The extra pay compensation is in addition to the vacations with pay extended this year to all factory employees of the company.
