blistering; he was lean and brown and looked much older. His lips had lost their ready laughter, and his eyes had a new brooding sadness. Somehow the old life seemed very far away. He hardly gave Mabel Bluff a thought now. She had never really counted on him that clearly. He would never trust a girl again. Anger burned within him on the rare occasions when he thought of her.

He did not forget Angus; but he was too tired to write when the day's work was over. Farmers were working overtime to make the most of the dry weather. The meteorological office had promised torrential rains and a long unsettled spell when the drought broke. Besides, Gerald was proud, and there was nothing he cared to tell his friend.

For once the weather prophets were justified. The rain lasted so long that the farmers spoke of floods, and disease broke out among the potatoes. Potato lifting started, and Gerald hated it even more than the work in the harvest fields. The mud caked in great clods on his shoes and clung stickily to his roughened hands. It caked in every line of skin and dried hard under his nails. He felt he would never be clean again. He did not mind the fatigue of the work, he had often been as tired after a strenuous day's climbing or a hard game of ruggar. But he reviled against the ugliness and monotony and dirt. He would have been thankful when it ended, if there had been a prospect of anything to follow it.

He was beginning to look on himself as a labourer and no more. He did not feel that he was fit for much else. His future was an uncertain as it had been when he left Lowbridge. He was thinner and shabbier but that was all. He had a few shillings—the result of these last days' hard work—and a pound note which he had treasured all summer to pay Michael's fare should the worst come to the worst and Michael have to go to Angus. As wet day followed wet day, he was more and more thankful for that note, although he was reluctant to use it.

Man and dog slept together, trying unsuccessfully to keep warm, and trudged off aimlessly in the morning. There did not seem much sense on trying for work in this weather, so they just walked on.

They left the village behind, following a muddy road where every passing vehicle plunked them in a shower of mud so Gerald turned down the first footpath. The sky was thick and grey. There was not exactly a fog but the air seemed gloomy with gathering rain, and the ground was wet. It always rained, thought Gerald with gloomy exaggeration. Forgetting how recently he had cursed the blazing sun which had sapped his energy and left him with aching eyes and blistered skin. They ate their lunch in the driest spot they could find, where the dense foliage of a holly oak protected the ground, leaving a circle of comparatively dry soil. Before they had finished the rain had started in good earnest and Gerald turned up his collar and shrugged.

"It's a foul day; we'll try for a bed at the first place we come to. Come on, old man."

The Atredale wagged approval, he knew what "bed" meant and did not approve of the rain any more than his master did.

The path ran beside a river, where occasional bushes and branches of trees swept past, and a hencoop and trough basket indicated the severity of the flood higher upstream. The utter dreariness was in keeping with Gerald's mood and his pace slackened. What was there to hurry for? The absolute aimlessness of this life was sapping his energy, mental as well as physical, and he knew it. If he did not get a decent job soon he would not be fit for it.

These thoughts were out short by a shout which sounded above the roar of the flooded river. Someone seemed in trouble and Gerald broke into a stumbling run, his rucksack bumping on his shoulders. But the surface was so slippery with mud that he had to slow to a walk. As he rounded a bend in the river, he caught sight of an elderly grey-haired man standing on the bank, gazing anxiously down at the river and giving shouts which sounded as if they were meant to be encouraging. Gerald's eyes followed his and there, in mid-stream, he saw a terrier, his short legs splashing inefficiently against the stream. As Gerald watched, he was carried further from the bank bobbing helplessly as a cork.

"After him, Mike. Fetch him, good lad." His words were instinctive.

The Atredale was trained to obedience and he plunged in. He caught the smaller dog by the scruff of the neck as if he had been a rat and turned for shore. Only then did Gerald realize the strength of the water. Had he done so before he would never have risked Michael (or another man's dog). The current tossed him about as if he were a puppy, but still he gripped that grey bundle in his mouth.

Now Gerald had completely forgotten both the man by his side and the errand on which he had dispatched Michael. He slipped off his rucksack and prepared to side down the muddy bank into the water.

"Man you can't. The weir's not half a mile away. Can't you hear it?" The hoarse voice and grip on his arm reminded him that he was not alone.

But he shook off the touch and dashed down the bank, landing on hands and knees in a few inches of water. Michael was nearing the bank but was nearly done. The current threatened to drag him out again—as if it had only swept him in for a jest—to make his loss all the sadder. But Gerald was determined not to let him go. He splashed out until he could seize him by the collar.

He would not have believed that such shallow water could have exerted such force. And the roaring of the weir seemed louder and louder in his ears. The stones under his feet rolled over as if they were conspiring to trip him up. He only kept his balance by an effort. He knew that if he once went down he could not rise again; the current would roll him over and over the weir.

Keep The Wheels Turning

Workers, whether in offices, stores, factories, or munition plants, are seeking in these vital days to do more work, better work. Management is quick to adopt ways and means to help employees keep refreshed while on the job. Recent tests made in some munition plants show that chewing gum while working helps relieve fatigue and nervous tension. As a result many industrial plants provide facilities so that employees may have chewing gum available at all times. Recent tests conducted by Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company Limited, in co-operation with plant management, indicate workers find refreshment by chewing gum while they work, the chewing helping to relieve fatigue and nervous tension. To bring this important factor before all employers and work people, Wm. Wrigley Jr. Company Limited is making very extensive and additional use of daily newspapers throughout Canada.
