MAY SEYMOUR
FOOT LOOSE
 by BEATRICE BURTON ONEA.

MAY SEYMOUR, whose husband you'll die of dullness there. You killed himself because of her love want to go to some gay place, don't you?" with Jim Carrow, returns you home after a year's absence. She disposes of her inherited property, and with $8000 in her handbag, sets out to find and marry a man with money.
 At Atlantic City she meets a divorcee, CARLOTTA FROKING, and her two friends, HERBERT WATERBURY and DAN SPRAGUE. Waterbury and Sprague both pay suit to May, to the disliking of Carlotta, who has been in love with Dan for twelve years. He asks May to marry him, but May refuses, having made up her mind that Waterbury is the millionaire husband she has set her heart upon.
 Waterbury makes love to May, but fails to ask her to marry him; and May, in a cold rage, decides to go to Europe to pastures new. In May's face. "In a little house at that moment Carlotta asks her to go to Los Altos, California, to spend the winter there with her in her bungalow.

At that moment Herbie limped into the room.

 "Just you and I. Would you like that?"
 May dropped her eyes, so that the black lashes cast a faint shadow on her cheeks. "I thought you said you liked gay places, not little cabins tucked away in the hills," she said, almost in a whisper.
 "I just know what Herbie Waterbury's plans were," she thought as she sat drinking her breakfast coffee in the vats, deserted dining room of the hotel.
 At that moment Herbie limped into the room. Or rather, he limped in, leaning heavily upon a malacca cane.
 "His eyes fell upon May, and he came straight toward her. 'Aren't you going to ask me to sit down?' he asked, standing beside her table. May flushed uncomfortably.
 "Of course, I want you to sit down," she said. "What in the world has happened to you—sprained your ankle?"
 "I wish that were all that ailed me," Herbie answered with a groan as he sat down. "That would be over soon, but this thing's likely to last for months. Rheumatism sticks once it gets a good hold on a man. I think I'll be moving on to California in a week or so."
 "California!" May exclaimed, her eyes flashing. "Why, in so glad you're going out there! I told Carlotta yesterday that I'd spend the winter there with her!"
 "Where . . . at her bungalow near Los Altos?" Waterbury asked, picking up the breakfast menu.
 "Mysteries Of The Ancients"

The stacks of lingerie that were piled on the floor.
 Carlotta nodded. Her mouth was too full of hot, buttered rolls to permit her to speak.
 "Well, if your invitation still stands, I've made up my mind to go west with you. May went on, 'Are you sure you want me?'
 "Sure, I'm sure," Carlotta said at last, in her cheerful, ungrammatical way. "Do you suppose you can get ready to go in three days?"
 May shrugged her delicate shoulders. "I could get ready to go to the North Pole in three hours," she said. "The wanderlust is on me these days. I don't know what makes me so restless . . . just looking at the sea, perhaps."
 Carlotta looked at her with puzzled eyes. She couldn't see why the sight of the ocean should make anybody restless. It was a pleasant body of water for swimming and it gave a picturesque touch to these eastern resorts. But why should it have any effect upon a person's mind, for pity's sake?
 "You amuse me, May," she yawned. And that was her way of saying that she didn't understand May at all.
 "But she's a good kid," she remarked to herself.
 Then aloud she said: "Well, I'm thrilled to death at the prospect of having someone cheerful around all winter. I'm not asking you to there as a guest. I expect you to be one of the family, and help me wash dishes 'n' everything."
 "I hope you won't treat me as a slave. I want you to let me share the expenses," May answered. "By the way, aren't you afraid to go away and leave Dan Sprague lying around loose, for so many months? Someone might marry him and take him off your hands entirely."
 Carlotta shrugged her plump little shoulders.
 "Oh, Dan'll show up out there," she said carelessly. "You can't lose a bad penny, you know. I thought he was off for life, and last night what did he do but take me out to dinner and pull all that marry-me-and-make-a-man-of-me stuff of his again!"
 May suppressed a laugh. "So when do you marry him?" she asked. "Today or tomorrow?"
 "Oh, I don't know. Never, probably," Carlotta answered. "I'm not so sure I want to marry anyone, really. Why should I? I'd lose all my nice, comfy alimony, for one thing . . . No, sometimes I'm certain I wouldn't marry the best man living!"
 The pity in May's heart showed in her eyes as she looked down at Carlotta. Poor little soul! She knew that Dan Sprague would never marry her, and all of this talk of hers was bravado, pure and simple.
 What a tragedy she was, under the rosy smiling mask of her face! And what sadness and disappointment was in the heart that beat under the absurd, lacy bed jacket that Carlotta wore!
 An unloved woman was the most pathetic sight under the wide heavens, unless she had work to do. Work and Love . . . the two finest things in the world. If you hadn't one or the other, what was the use in being alive?
 "I know all about work," May said to herself, polishing her nails thoughtfully with Carlotta's silver buffer. "and it's medicine for a good many things. But I'd like to know what it's like to really be in love, before I die."
 She searched her heart, and knew that she had never had more than a passing fancy for any man. She had marvelled at women who took one man all of their love—who gave one man into their hearts, forever and ever.
 "Would it ever come to her—that splendid gift of love?"
 And what would she do, if it did come to her—not to May Seymour, free to give herself as she would—but to Mrs. Herbert Waterbury, who had married for money?
 Ah, there was a question worth considering!

 Cotton A VERY OLD FABRIC
 Cotton cloth has been worn almost as long as civilization can account for any wearing apparel aside from the skins of wild animals. One of the oldest books in the world, the Bible, mentions the manufacture of cotton cloth. It is thought that it was first made in India and that it found its way thence through Persia, Palestine, Rome and Europe. It was first manufactured in Europe in the tenth century. The word cotton comes from the port of Calcutta, from which place it was first exported.
