The Girl Who Had No Chance

By MARION RUBINCAM

RUTH LEARNS
Chapter 91

Most of her second week in the city turned out to be very busy and rather exciting. As she had promised Langley, she phoned the young woman on one of the big magazines, who had wanted her story, and spent an evening talking to her.

The girl was a sympathetic and intelligent listener. When Ruth stopped talking of her work, the girl questioned her and led her on, until she learned all the details of it.

"I just want to make a few notes of some things," she said when Ruth stopped, literally out of breath from talking. "How many people were in the town before you started your work—and how many more now? How many factories are going up, and what's the average scale of wages being paid, and give me an idea of the expenses in town like yours."

Ruth laughed.

"But I must have bored you talking so much. There's no stopping me when I'm off on my favorite subject, which is model housing. But really, you know, I'm not an important person and I should not be put in a magazine. I haven't done anything."

"No, you're wrong, Miss O'Neil, you are doing wonders. I've been making a study of model housing and the conditions of workingmen's families for some of the women's magazines, and I know quite a bit about it. You are doing a great many original things. You see, being a woman, you grasp the needs of the laborer's wife, and plan your housing for her comfort as well."

she went on, pointing out the better parts of Ruth's plans, and by the end of the evening, almost had the girl's life history.

"Of course I must have a photograph of you," she said. "Something with a light, frivolous dress on, to make you look young and easy to manage. Be doing all this—im sending to Marketown for pictures of the new city being built there."

So Ruth ended by going to a fashionable photographer's, where pictures were promised in a few days. Meantime, probably because the girl from the magazine had told them, some newspapers sent for interviews with Ruth, who suddenly found herself a celebrity in a small way. And when the photographs were done and sent to her, she was amazed at the result. For the man, being a real artist, had posed her so as to bring out all her good points. She was very pretty in the pictures.

It was Marie who kept track of these things for Ruth. Marie's interest in the beginning was only in the generous tips Ruth gave her, but after a few days she developed a sincere fondness for the new guest at the hotel, particularly as she could do so much in the way of making "madamoiselle" look pretty when she dressed her for the evening. Marie cut all the clippings from the papers, even the little society notes where Ruth's name was included among the lists of guests at parties she was now invited to.

And Ruth was growing prettier under the work and excitement of a sort—was coming to her, she felt differently towards Tim—she could not tell how or why. She thought it was a little disappointing on her part, and a little sorrow, for Tim was not as interesting as he had been. She wasn't sure what it was—only she felt she cared for him even more, much as she still fought the idea.

One afternoon Gabrielle Cartez came down. Gaby was in a musical comedy, and Ruth had not had time to hunt her up when she first came to the city. She could talk to her, for Gaby knew and had a great understanding and sympathy.

She came in looking as stunning as ever, in a very smart little black velvet dress that made her dark hair and her extraordinary dark eyes even more lovely. The two girls settled at opposite ends of the big couch in Ruth's living room and looked at each other in smiling admiration.

Marie placed tea things on the little table and went out. Gaby's eyes followed her, then glanced around the apartment in appreciation.

"And the first time you came to New York you came on an aunt's charity and lived in a fourth-rate boarding house and walked to save carfare!" Gaby said, turning to smile at Ruth. "The next time I saw you, you were a stenographer in a tiny office in a fourth-rate town—"

"It's ceased being a fourth-rate town—you should see our new buildings!" Ruth interrupted.

"And now I see you in the lap of luxury," Gaby went on. "Ruth, are you engaged yet?"

"Heavens no!" Ruth looked up from the very serious operation of pouring tea. "But you are," she went on. "I saw Myra, who said she thought you were."

"So you've seen Myra!" Gaby gave her attention to her tea for a moment. "As a matter of fact, I'm not engaged. I was several times," Ruth looked up with a little gasp and a laugh, and Gaby answered with one of her merriest and most mischievous smiles.

"I know it isn't quite right," she said. "But being engaged is not a serious matter. I always think I like the man, but after having him call me 'darling' romantically for a few weeks, I find I don't. So I break the engagement. I consider marriage very serious indeed—that's why I've always broken off my engagements before I committed myself."

Ruth tried to follow this logic but gave it up.

"Tell me about Myra," Gaby said suddenly.

DON'T SPOIL YOUR HAIR BY WASHING IT

When you wash your hair, be careful what you use. Do not use prepared shampoos or anything else that contains too much free alkali, for this is very injurious, as it dries the scalp and makes the hair brittle.

The best thing to use is Mulsified Coconut Oil shampoo, for this is pure and entirely greaseless. It is very cheap and beats anything else all to pieces.

Simply put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup of glass with a little warm water, then moisten the hair with water and rub the Mulsified in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, cleanses thoroughly, and rinses out easily. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and is soft, fresh looking, bright, fluffy, wavy and easy to manage. Best of all, it loosens and takes out every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff.

You can get Mulsified coconut oil shampoo at any drug store, and a few ounces will last everyone in the family for months. Be sure you get Mulsified. Beware of imitations. Look for the name Watkins on the package.
