Our conversation was interrupted there by the appearance of Mallory at the doctor's elbow. It was rather amusing to watch his face as he read the note from Ashton that the doctor handed him. It was easy to see from his suppressed smile of contemptuous amusement, that the district attorney had represented us as a couple of harmless cranks who might safely be permitted to amuse themselves upon the scene of crime as they chose.

"All right," he said, folding up the note and thrusting it into his pocket. "Make yourself at home. Do you plan to spend the night here?"
"Two or three nights, perhaps," said the doctor. "We want to do a little looking about."

"Well," said Mallory, with jocular sarcasm. "If you find the secret of the old man's past, or meet up with that mysterious woman that one of the witnesses testified about at the inquest, why let me know?"
"You mean to spend the night here yourself, don't you?" I asked.

"Well, part of it, perhaps. I've got some looking about to do. But you needn't mind me, I've got a key and can let myself in at any time."

An hour later, after a beautiful but vilely cooked meal at a little restaurant near the railway station, we returned to the house and began our investigation in earnest.

The first room, of course, to attract our attention was the room where the murder took place, the study on the third floor. Across one end of the room ran a rude set of homemade shelves occupied, perhaps, by two or three hundred nondescript volumes. A very large, much-littered desk stood in the middle of a larger part of the room, while in the alcove was a high deal table of the sort used by draught-men. A stool stood before it, and a swivel chair in front of the desk.

In one of the numerous corners of the room was an immense hamper, which seemed to have served the purpose of a waste-paper basket. The detectives had evidently examined the contents of it in their search for a clue to the murdered man's identity, but had not thought the contents worth preserving. There was a litter of small scraps about it, and that was all. A rusty oil stove completed the tale of furniture.

And then there were his maps. They were curiously disposed for a man who made a habit of geography. They lay about the floor in great rolls. The one or two I looked at, after my preliminary glance about the apartment, were of recent date and bore the stamp of the British board of trade.

I was holding one of them out in my hands and poring over it, wondering rather idly, what possible interest this group of tiny coral reefs could have had for a man who lived, here in this village of Oak Ridge, when a sharp exclamation from Doctor McAllister drew my attention away from it.

He was standing close beside a big green shaded lamp and bending over something which he had just taken from the top drawer of the desk. I shivered a little when I saw what it was, saw that it was a violin string.

His expression of the doctor's face, as he turned toward me, betrayed both indignation and excitement. "The prosecution of crime still goes on the basis that telling the truth is an easy thing to do; that a man does tell the truth, unless he means to lie. The man who came up here and found the body of Henry Morgan testified that he had been strangled by a noose. They thought it was true, because strangulation by a noose is the only kind they ever heard of. But look at this."

He held it out to me, and, my repugnance forgotten, I took it in hand. Instead of one knot, the string contained two, one near the end, the other about fifteen inches away. They were tied just alike, and were knots of the fixed-lock variety, very like a bowline.

"If there were only a knot at the end," said the doctor, "the rest of the string could have been drawn through it to form a noose; but, of course, with this second knot of equal size that becomes impossible. The man was strangled, not by a noose at all, but by a tourniquet—a little stick—a lead pencil—thrust—run through the two loops and twisted."

"Look here!" he cried the next moment, with rising excitement. "Here's the rest of the instrument."

He held it out for my inspection a long straight-stemmed briar pipe, and I was able to see, just at the base of the bowl, a shiny, circular indentation. The ghastly clearness of the demonstration of the murderer's method sickened me a little, and I dropped the pipe rather quickly.

My chief was pacing up and down the room, talking to himself. "I never believed in that noose—not really believed in it."
"You are undoubtedly right about it," said I, "but is the discovery important? Does it make any real difference?"

"That depends on the point of view," said he. "To the late Henry Morgan, I suppose it made no difference at all. To an ethnologist, it makes all the difference in the world. The Caucasian uses the noose. With him it has been the instrument of execution, of murder and of suicide from time immemorial. But there are other races never heard of it. The aborigines in my part of the world never did. With them it was always this."

He caught up the string as he spoke, and jerked it taut in both hands. "It's the instrument of ceremonial murder. They used to send widows out of the world this way, until the British government put a stop to that etiquette."
Then, and only then, did I realize the importance of the discovery. "And the girl at the hospital?" I questioned. "Would those two lops be familiar to her?"

He nodded gravely. "I'll tell you this," said he. "I'm under no obligation to report to Ashton until I'm ready."
Then he did a characteristic thing. He put the thing back in the drawer where he had found it, closed the drawer, straightened up, with a shrug of his broad shoulders, and said, in obviously good faith: "Come, let's be gone."

Rather to my surprise, the doctor made straight for the waste-paper basket, growled a little at the "fools" who had emptied it, and patiently fathered together the few scraps that were left, some clinging in the interstices of the basket, some littered about the floor outside.

Last week was the best mackerel fishing week that has been witnessed for years on the north side as well as off of Souris when our local fishermen had good catches, some of them bringing in as high as twelve hundred in a day. It is the hope of every order of the day this week.

On Sunday afternoon a couple of young lads took a car which was parked on the line road and went for a spin without the consent of the owner. The ride was very short for they overturned the car coming down a hill with the result that they almost completely demolished the car. As it happened both boys escaped injury.

The funeral of the late Mrs. F. Howlett took place from her late residence at Gowan Erac to Rolls Bay Church on Saturday. The funeral was largely attended by her many friends and neighbours which showed the high esteem in which the deceased lady was held. Much sympathy goes out to her sorrowing husband and little children in this sad bereavement.
