SHORT COURSES IN AGRICULTURE.—During the past two seasons the Department of Agriculture has conducted a series of short courses throughout this Province, and it is the intention to hold a number during the coming winter. These courses are located in various parts of the Province according to request, and have been received in the past with the hearty support of all those who made it their opportunity to be in attendance. Such work as this, especially when the need of enlightenment and production is needed, is of value to the Province. Present conditions demand organized efforts. Men cannot as they could a few years ago, conduct their transactions individually, but must organize and be a force in guiding production through the most economic channels of commerce. The short course has never been used to give a great amount of scientific, theoretical knowledge, but is a valuable source for practical hints. Each subject of importance in agricultural work is thoroughly discussed from the view point of the man who is putting such work into practice. A valuable part is that those living in the community become better acquainted to inaugurate and foster community efforts. Such courses can only be a success when the co-operation of the people in the district is assured. In view of this, it is the duty of every farmer to attend, and not only receive practical information on the raising of stock or grain, but to give his personal views that may be of assistance to others. The first course will be held at Baltic, commencing on Monday evening, December 3rd at 7.30; and others will follow in regular order, and will be advertised from time to time.

RUMANIA'S DESOLATION DESCRIBED BY QUEEN

By Queen Mary of Rumania

The beautiful Queen Mary of Rumania has been doing Red Cross work since the German army invaded her country and captured its capital, Bucharest. She was an English princess being a daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha before her marriage. In the following tribute to the French, printed in the Paris Figaro, the Queen reveals touchingly, not only the tragedy of martyred Rumania, but also some of her personal sorrow. My country which has so bravely answered the call of the allies, although it had witnessed the martyrdom of Belgium and of Serbia—my country, which knew very well the horrible risks which small nations are running when they attempt to raise their voices in favor of honor and justice—my country is bleeding from a thousand wounds. But I do not wish to speak of Rumania's sufferings. My intention is to render the homage which is due to those who came from the "sweet country of France" to help France's younger sister, who had always nourished an ardent love for France. I, who belong to the Anglo-Saxon race, was recently astonished to hear with how great an affection my Rumanians were speaking of France.

I knew that it was my duty to be strong; that it was my duty to show courage which would be an example for others, and to conceal my sorrow. But I was so tired and so broken that nothing would have seemed to me sweeter than to lie down and die; to feel no longer, to think no longer, to struggle no longer—to rest in peace.

Serving Her People

One morning while I was leaving the train in which I was living, together with our refugees, on our way to Jassy, I was asked to receive Dr. Jean Clunet, the brave physician who had undertaken to organize a hospital for contagious diseases. Clunet was an enthusiast, an idealist, with something of the artist in him. His looks reflected an energy which almost approached fanaticism when he was inspired by the thought of his work and his struggle. Clunet struggled all through that terrible winter, which seemed to have no end and which seems like a gloomy nightmare to those who have lived it through. Cold, hunger and disease were all attacking us at the same time. Our means of subsistence were becoming scarce, communications were interrupted, traffic almost impossible. Typhoid fever had broken the defenders of our country by the thousands, because we were unable to save them in the general disorder. Half buried in the snow in his hospital far away almost isolated from the rest of the world, surrounded by a few heroic Frenchwomen and by the Sisters of Saint Vincent de Paul, who are almost like saints, Clunet struggled heroically—the harder the struggle the happier he was. He spoke of the spring that was to come as one speaks of a promised land that one hopes to reach soon, and where everything will be made easier, more attainable. The bad dream he hoped would vanish with the first blossoms of the lilac.—But, Clunet did not see the lilacs blossoming. I went several times to see Clunet during his illness.

Heroic French Doctor

When I came the third time the dying man had found his peace; the struggle was ended. Jean Clunet's eyes were extinguished, his noble heart was beating no longer. Very quiet, at the foot of his bed, there was sitting a young woman who had accompanied him to this distant country, and who now remained alone; although no longer in a foreign country. The black eyes of the young widow were fixed on mine. They were without tears; but in spite of her almost divine resignation there was in her eyes that silent questioning expression, mixed with terror and despair which I have so often noticed in the eyes of those who witnessed the death of those who were dearest to them.

On a bed, which was just as plain as that of the master at her side, there lay Sister Angele, who died at most at the same time as he. They were lying side by side; he, who was the champion of science, and she the humble servant of God.

I have spoken at length about Clunet because I knew him best of the great number of physicians admirably for their knowledge and their devotion.

THE WAR LOAF.

As Lord Northcliffe said in Montreal, "There is no such thing as white bread in the Old Country from the pig's table downwards." Other cereals are being used, but they cannot stand alone for bread. The Allies must add them to wheat flour to make the war bread now in universal use in European countries. Except in Italy, where the people normally consume more corn, there are few cereals in Europe. Cornmeal, not being a durable commodity cannot be shipped across the ocean in great quantities.

The Allies must have a wheat flour basis for their war loaf. Unless the people of Canada and the United States are willing to substitute other cereals for part of the wheat flour which they normally consume, they will be denying even war bread to many thousands of people. Substitution of at least one pound of other cereals for one pound of wheat for export, it would still be far short of meeting the normal consumption requirements of the Allies but it would save the situation.
