CHAPTER 39
BROKEN FRIENDSHIP

Jack Farquhar rode moodily up-town in a taxi. His lean dark face was stern; his gray eyes boded ill for some one; his handsome mouth was set in a grim line.

"There's a gentleman waiting to see you in your room, Captain Farquhar," the hotel clerk told him, as he passed through the lobby. "He's been waiting some time."

Farquhar nodded, ascended in the elevator, and opened his door. "Gilroy Holmes was lounging comfortably in a chair, smoking a cigarette."

"You're a cool one!" he laughed. "You gave me an appointment for five o'clock this afternoon, and it's now a quarter past six. And I passed up tea with a darned attractive girl, too."

Farquhar closed the door and leaned against it. His mouth was unsmiling.

"You'd have lost out anyway," he said quietly. "She had tea with me."

Holmes stared at him in astonishment.

"You know Miss Mason?" Farquhar shook his head; an ironical gleam had come into his eyes.

"No, but I know the girl with whom you were undoubtedly planning to have tea. She happens to be my fiancée."

"Are you crazy?" demanded Holmes.

"No. Only pretty mad—and pretty disgusted."

"I don't know what you're talking about."

"It's no use pretending, Holmes. She admitted it herself."

"See here," Holmes got to his feet and advanced toward his friend, "do I understand that you're telling me that some girl you're engaged to claimed she was having tea with me? Why, man, you said yesterday that you are still engaged to Lila Latham."

"Exactly," said Farquhar dryly. "Then how—" began Holmes bewilderedly.

Farquhar took a step toward him. His face was not pleasant to see.

"I trusted you, Holmes. You knew that Lila and I were pledged to each other. Wasn't it playing it rather low down on a pal to take advantage of his being supposedly bumped off in the line of duty, and to make love to his girl, as soon as he was safely out of the way?"

"That's a lie!" flared Holmes. "Whoever told you such rot?"

Holmes was the calm reply.

"Lila? Are you crazy? I haven't set eyes on Lila Latham since the night we had that supper-party in France, and you and I moved up the line."

Farquhar smiled contemptuously. He walked over to the table, selected a cigarette from a box, and lit it. Then he seated himself on the edge of the table and regarded Holmes with cold eyes.

"Well, he reflected, marriage would soon rid her of that. He had rather old-fashioned views on marriage; he demanded a partnership, not a one-sided arrangement, whereby a man slaved all day while his wife flirted about like a gay butterfly from one social affair to the next. For one thing, he couldn't afford much of the social stuff. He had to earn his money. If Lila loved him, and if she was the girl he'd wooed in France, she'd risk it with him. But suppose she wouldn't? Suppose she didn't really want to try? Suppose all this talk about a forced engagement to save her father from ruin was a lie? Suppose she had ceased to care and hadn't the heart to tell him so? Farquhar groaned and dropped his head in his hands. Curiously, he felt more lonely and forlorn than he had felt in the German prison-camp. He had lost a friend, and something, seemed to warn him that he was losing his fiancée. "But I won't give her up," he said through clenched teeth. "I won't. Never, if I die for it!" (To Be Continued.)

"I'd expect you to deny it," he said quietly.
Holmes was red and angry. "See here, Jack, there's been some ghastly mistake. Lila can't have told you any such rot. Use your common sense, man. If there had been such an affair, she'd be the last one to confess it."

"It wasn't exactly Lila who confessed it," said Farquhar carefully. "It was a friend of hers who reminded her of what she'd confessed—and I happened, by accident, to overhear it."

Holmes uttered a relieved exclamation: "Oh, if that's all!"

"All?" echoed Farquhar wrathfully.

"Well, don't you see," argued Holmes, "if you only overheard something, you've no idea of what was actually said? How do you know what the two girls were referring to, or whether they were in earnest? Did you ask Lila about what you heard?"

"Naturally."
"And what did she say?"
"She denied it—naturally."
"Had she any explanation?"
Farquhar smiled grimly.

"None that was logical or convincing."
"Well, that's a prerogative of women."

Farquhar swung himself off the table. He came close to Holmes. His eyes were like tiny pin-points of brilliance.

"You were my friend, Holmes. I think I'd have given my life for you. But that's neither here nor there, now. I've got this to say: You keep away from Lila. I'll overlook the past, as far as she's concerned, but as for you—" he walked to the door and flung it open.

"Get out!"
With a shrug, Holmes picked up his hat and went.

Farquhar flung himself into a chair and stared moodily at the wall.

A friend lost! A friend whom he loved! And the girl whom he loved—and the girl whom he loved—what of her?

At that instant he almost hated Lila for taking from him a friendship he had prized long before the war, when he and Gil Holmes had faced death together in the trenches. He fell to pondering on his new Lila. She had changed. She had told him so, but he had not believed her. She was not the same frank, fearless young thing whose staunch courage had won his admiration as well as his love. It seemed as though luxury and ease and peace had softened her; she had taken on the pretty, futile artificialities that he hated.

Well, he reflected, marriage would soon rid her of that. He had rather old-fashioned views on marriage; he demanded a partnership, not a one-sided arrangement, whereby a man slaved all day while his wife flirted about like a gay butterfly from one social affair to the next. For one thing, he couldn't afford much of the social stuff. He had to earn his money. If Lila loved him, and if she was the girl he'd wooed in France, she'd risk it with him. But suppose she wouldn't? Suppose she didn't really want to try? Suppose all this talk about a forced engagement to save her father from ruin was a lie? Suppose she had ceased to care and hadn't the heart to tell him so? Farquhar groaned and dropped his head in his hands.

Curiously, he felt more lonely and forlorn than he had felt in the German prison-camp. He had lost a friend, and something, seemed to warn him that he was losing his fiancée. "But I won't give her up," he said through clenched teeth. "I won't. Never, if I die for it!" (To Be Continued.)

THE SOILS OF P. E. I.

The soils of Prince Edward Island have been made the study of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa in regard to their composition, and in the report of the work done the Dominion Chemist makes recommendations as to the fertilizer treatment that should be given to produce profitable farm produce. The soils for the most part are classed as brownish red sandy loam suitable for a large number of farm crops. With judicious management, including the upkeep of humus-forming material, these soils may be expected to prove excellent for general farming practice. Samples taken from widely distributed areas and from fields that have been under crop for many years were found to be rather below the average of productive sandy loams. The recommendations made for the improvement of the soils include the addition of such humus-forming material as farm manures, the turning under of green crops such as buckwheat, rye and clover, and on markedly acid soils the application of ground limestone or other lime bearing material. It is also suggested that increased crop yields may be obtained by a rational use of commercial fertilizers, particularly for growing potatoes.

This bulletin, available at the Publications Branch of the Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, suggests the mixtures that should give profitable returns on average sandy loam for the potato crop.

Health Services of Canadian Medical Association

CANCER

With the knowledge that we now possess, the cure of cancer is only possible when the disease is recognized early and proper treatment started at once.

One of the reasons for advising that every person should go to his family physician once a year for a Health Examination is to provide for the discovery of disease in its early stages, and so permit of treatment at a time when it offers the best chance of cure. Otherwise, it is left to the untrained lay person to decide for himself that he is in need of medical care.

For the particular benefit of this latter group, it is necessary to point out the conditions which, if they occur, should be considered as danger signals, and should turn these persons in the direction of their family physician without delay. Everyone who experiences one of the danger signals is not developing cancer, but it requires medical skill to decide whether or not the symptoms which are present mean cancer.

In its early stages, cancer is a local condition, and, if it is completely removed, there will be no recurrence. If it is not removed, it spreads to other parts of the body and may cause cancer in these other parts. This is the simple explanation of the need for proper early treatment.

Any lump, particularly in the female breast, any abnormal discharge, any sore that does not readily heal, any wart or mole that changes in size or appearance are danger signals.

Pain may not occur in the early stages. The person who thinks that the condition cannot be serious because there is no pain is mistaken, and, as a result, he may allow the time for cure to slip past.

Medical and surgical knowledge, experience and skill are at the service of the public, but they must wait until the public decide to call upon them.

Questions concerning health, addressed to the Canadian Medical Association, 184 College St., Toronto, will be answered by letter. Questions as to diagnosis and treatment will not be answered.

Summer Complaints Kill Little Ones

At the first sign of illness during the hot weather give the little one Baby's Own Tablets. In a few hours he may be beyond aid. These Tablets will prevent summer complaint if given occasionally to the well child, and will promptly relieve these troubles if they come on suddenly. Baby's Own Tablets should always be kept in every home where there are young children. They are no other medicine as good as the mother has the guarantee that they are absolutely safe. They are sold by all druggists or will be mailed on receipt of price, 25 cents per box, by The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont. A little booklet, "Care of the Baby in Health and Sickness," will be sent free to any mother on request.

Children.

Will Rogers has the following to say about child care: "Being a ranchman and a farmer and also a child owner, I have often wished that when one of my children got sick, I could wire or call up some government expert and have him come look at them. Like I can do if one of my cows or pigs get some disease."

"If your fertilizer is not agreeing with your land the government will send a specialist, but if the food is not agreeing with the baby why we have to find out what's the matter ourselves, and a lot of times parents mean well but they don't know much."

"So I am glad that you people are interested in children. Course they are a lot of trouble but we don't seem to be smart enough to find something that would be less trouble that would replace them."

Approximately 70 per cent of the goat and kid leather produced in the world is tanned in the United States, which is the greatest consumer.

A recent official survey estimated that the Fiji Islands contained about 2,366,000 acres of forests, or more than 51 per cent of their area.

ITCHY ECZEMA ON BABY'S FACE

Broke Out in Watery Pimples. Cuticura Healed.

"Eczema broke out in watery pimples on my baby's face. It itched and burned so badly that she scratched, and her face was covered with sore eruptions. When she scratched the eruptions they used to bleed and stay awake nights. It caused disfigurement for a while. I sent for a free sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment and after using it I purchased two boxes of Cuticura Soap and two boxes of Cuticura Ointment, and in five weeks she was completely healed."
