Navy Beau

She studied him curiously. "You seem changed, Phil — somehow bitter."

"Do I? Well, frankly, I am bitter."

"What's wrong?"

He told her, then, about Dave—about his court martial and resignation, and what had been behind it all.

"Hmm," said Lanya, when he had finished. "So Joyce Hammond broke with him, did she?"

"Yes—she let him down hard. She's going to marry that movie fellow, Ward Martin."

"Oh, no — you're wrong. I saw that story in the papers but, the next day, she issued a statement denying that she and Martin were engaged."

"Well, anyway she let Dave down."

Lanya hesitated, then asked, "Phil, are you still in love with her?"

"Who ever said I was?"

"You did, darling. You told me all when I saw you in Annapolis last year, right after you'd met her. Don't you remember? You were so in earnest, it was amusing—though it hurt, too, to know that another girl had affected you so much. You said you were going away because you had found out your friend Dave was in love with her." Lanya paused. "So now, that noble sacrifice in Dave's behalf has turned out to have been in vain?"

"Yes."

"And you're disillusioned?"

"Yes—if I ever thought I was in love with her. I'm completely over it. Since she has been in Hollywood, she has beat me at my own game."

"I'll say she has!" remarked Lanya. "The number of men she has had on her string is well advertised. Ward Martin is only one of many. Right now she seems to be favoring Roger Channel."

"How do you know?" Phil asked quickly.

"Oh, I spent some time in Los Angeles before Father and I sailed for here. I saw her with Roger at several parties and kept running into them at night clubs."

"I see," said Phil slowly.

He lapsed into moody silence. Why, he wondered, should he care just which man she was favoring at the moment?

CHAPTER XVIII

Phil hated to see Lanya sail. They had had a gay week together—swimming, dancing, polo games and parties.

They stood at the foot of the gangplank of the great white ship which was to take Lanya and her father on to Manila. It was one of those colorful Honolulu sailings, with bands playing and bright serpentine streaming from the high decks of the liner.

Lanya had her sailing lei about her neck, and her eyes were shining.

"It's been a lovely week, Phil."

"Be sure to come back."

"I shall."

"You won't if your lei sinks when you drop it overboard," he reminded her.

"Mine won't sink."

"Well, I'll be here waiting for you."

"All right, darling. Now I must go aboard."

Phil bent quickly and kissed her. As she stepped back she smiled up at him and blinked her eyes. He thought he detected tears in them, but told himself he must be mistaken. Lanya was too cool-headed and self-possessed for tears.

"Aloha, Phil. . . ." She turned and went up the gangplank.

Soon, he was watching the ship warp away from the pier. A shower of flower leis dropped to the water. That old custom—if a lei sank, its owner wasn't coming back to Hawaii.

Phil, looking up, saw Lanya drop hers. Her eyes followed its fall. It touched the water — — — floated. He smiled and waved to Lanya. He was going to miss her. . . .

Two weeks later, Joyce Hammond arrived in Honolulu with a movie unit on location. The newspapers ran pictures of her and other members of the group including Roger Channel, and gave much space to the story of their impending activities.

Phil, of course, saw all this and was glum over it. Why did Joyce have to keep crossing his path? He know they would probably run into each other sooner or later.

He was right. They met a few days later—and he had no chance to avoid her. She came out of a store, with her arms filled with packages, and all but bumped into him.

"Phil!"

"Hello," he said cudtly.

She didn't miss his tone, and smiled uncertainlyq. "You act as though you are sorry to see me."

"Not entirely," he answered brusquely. "I want to talk to you."

She looked at him a moment. "I know what you're going to say — but do you have to?"

"Yes. Can we go somewhere now and talk?"

Joyce bit her lip. "That's my car there at the curb. I hired it for my stay here. We can drive around a while if you like."

"That suits me."

A Kanaka chauffeur standing beside the car took Joyce's packages, and she and Phil climbed into the rear.

HOUSEHOLD DONT'S TO REMEMBER

Don't, relegate favorite china to the top shelf just because it is cracked or chipped; a little china cement and careful mending will make it almost as good as new. Don't neglect minor upholstery repairs; you may not be able actually to re-upholster expertly, but even an amateur can tighten springs and turn out pretty tailored-looking slipcovers. Don't forget to clean and oil, according to directions, electrical appliances. Don't have dingy rooms, when rugs and draperies can be inexpensively freshened and renovated by cleaning and dyeing. Don't allow silver or other metal ornaments to become tarnished and dull; if they are worth having around, they are worth keeping bright and shining. Repairs and renewals promptly attended to, keep any house from getting down-at-the-heel.
