BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)
THE DISPLACED ONES
Have pity for the folk who know no home, and have no place to go. -Yap Yap the Prairie Dog.
Folks who have lost their homes and friends and have been made to wander out into the Great World away from all they had held dear, are called displaced persons. There is nothing quite so sad as being a displaced person. Ever since the last World War there have been ever and ever so many displaced persons.
Yap Yap and Mrs. Yap Yap were displaced persons. They had had one of the finest homes in Yappville, the Prairie Dog town. They had been driven from it by fear and now they didn't know where to go, which way to turn. Blackfoot the Ferret, own cousin to Shadow the Weasel, had come to Yappville. Nobody knew where he had come from. That didn't matter. The thing that did matter was that he was there, and no one is more feared by the Prairie Dog folk than Blackfoot the Ferret. You see he is very fond of Prairie Dog dinners, and he is so slim he can do what other equally fond of such dinners cannot do - go right down in the Prairie Dog homes after them. So those homes were no longer what they had been all along, safe places for their owners. The Yap Yaps hadn't wanted to leave their homes. My goodness, no! Of course not! But they had done it. They had waited only long enough for a chance to sneak away without being noticed. They had made sure that no Coyote and no Fox was around; that no Eagle or Hawk was alling high in the sky. Then when Yap Yap, peeping from his doorway, had seen Blackfoot go into another house they had slipped away from the village and run as fast as their legs could take them, all the time trying to keep where the weeds and grasses were highest. So it was that they got away without being seen by any one but Sandy the Burrowing Owl, and he wasn't interested. Now their legs are not long, and short legs tire sooner than long legs. So it wasn't long before they just had to stop and rest. Close together they had squatted among some tall weeds.
"Do you think he will follow us?" panted Mrs. Yap Yap. Of course she meant Blackfoot the Ferret.
"No," replied Yap Yap. He was panting too. He didn't see us leave. He wouldn't have followed us anyway. It would be much easier, much less trouble, to go down in a house and catch some one else. I'm not afraid of him any more. He'll stay right there in the village as long as he can find a dinner there without too much trouble. We've always had to watch for Eagles and Hawks and Coyotes and Foxes and Badgers, but we've always had a safe place to run. Now we haven't. So we simply mustn't be seen. And there is no one to help watch, to warn us if they see danger we don't. So we will have to be extra watchful and careful. We won't have a chance if one of those sees us." "I'm afraid," whimpered Mrs. Yap Yap.
"That's good. So am I," replied Yap Yap. "What is good about it?" snapped Mrs. Yap Yap crossly. "We'll keep better watch than if we were not afraid," said Yap Yap. "There was a lot of wisdom in that small head of his. 'Now let's be moving,' he added. "Where to?" asked Mrs. Yap Yap.
"How should I know?" retorted Yap Yap a wee bit sharply. "We'll just go somewhere, anywhere, and stop when we get there," he added, which wasn't very clear to Mrs. Yap Yap on to himself. But to displaced persons where they are going and what they will do when they get there is seldom any clearer than that.
So they ran on, sometimes one way, sometimes another way, but always away from Yappville and the friends they had known all their lives. They never ran far in any one direction. You see they ran from clump to clump and patch to patch of the tallest plants because these hid them best. And the clumps seldom grew in a straight line. In a little while they were completely lost. Most displaced persons are.
