Heard at Lunch.

"But Brown, see here, weren't you a great sufferer from dyspepsia and indigestion?" "I should say I was," replied Brown, with a happy chuckle, "I often wished that I were dead, it seemed to me that any food, however plain and wholesome, that I put in my stomach, lay there like so many cold, hard stones. Then fermentation would set in, and sour liquids, whatever they are, would rise up in my throat and fairly choke me with their scalding. I finally got so that I dreaded meal-times, and a dull, chronic pain was always present in my abdomen, as though a stick, sharpened at both ends, were keeping the sides of it apart."

"Well, how did you get rid of your disorder? I, myself, am troubled with indigestion, and I am afraid that the stuff the doctor prescribed isn't doing me much good." "Hutch, old man, simply Hutch, the greatest and most convenient cure ever put within the reach of suffering humanity. The directions say that 'one Hutch gives instant relief,' and that's the way I found it. I am now free from any trace of indigestion, always carry my Hutch with me, and I'm now ready for my luncheon—Try Hutch, old man."
