Another Bad Night Could Get No Rest

To the thousands who toss, night after night, on sleepless beds and to whose eyes slumber will not come.

To those who sleep in a kind of way, but whose rest is broken by bad dreams and nightmares.

To those who wake up in the morning as tired as on going to bed, we offer in Milburn's Health and Nerve Pills a remedy to help soothe and calm the nerves and bring them back to a perfect condition, and when this is done there should be no more sleepless nights due to shattered nerves.

POLICE COURT—At the Police Court yesterday a man charged with using abusive language was fined $5, and costs or 10 days. The case of a woman charged with having unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor was adjourned until today. A summary ejectment case was also adjourned until today.

FUNERAL YESTERDAY —The funeral of Mrs. J. Wallace Shaw, which was largely attended was held yesterday afternoon from the McLean Funeral Home where service was held by Rev. Dr. R. Moorhead Legate, who also conducted service at the grave. The pallbearers were: Messrs. S. A. MacLeod, F. A. A. Mutch, John Martin, Chas. Gregor, Louis Stewart and Nicholas Power. Interment was in the People's Cemetery.

CAPTURE FOX PUPS—Returning from their herring nets, Charles Watts and three companions of Tracadie had the good fortune to capture seven fox pups. Noticing a black fox on the shore, the men brought their boat to land and followed the animal to a den where the young pups were found. The fishermen forced the fox to leave the den and, along with their dog who was present, gave chase. The fleet footed fox escaped, however. The men returned to the den and took the pups home where they are housed and being cared for.

LIKELY SUCCESSOR —As reported in the news columns this week, decision was taken by the Maritime Stock Breeders Association that there would be no Maritime Winter Fair at Amherst next fall unless there was an improvement in the war situation. At a directors' meeting held prior to the annual meeting, this problem was discussed. In the event of the fair being held, one of the major issues to be decided would be the appointment of a manager, a position made vacant when Major Arthur W. Mackenzie went overseas. "As a successor," says the Amherst News, "the name of Keith Boswell of Victoria, P. E. I., has been strongly presented. Mr. Boswell, now vice president for his Province, has a longer official connection with the Winter Fair than any one today upon the directorate. He saw active service in the Great War."

WOODCOCKS SCARCE —The possibility of a closed season on woodcocks in the Province was announced by a game official last night. This bird suffered a loss of 60 per cent of the species at their winter home in Louisiana due to the coldest winter in 100 years in that state. As a result the number of woodcocks has dwindled to such an extent that a closed season on them has been hinted. They feed on worms which are procured by the birds boring into the mud with their bills. Frozen ground prevented them from reaching their food supply and many of the species perished. They do not feed on grain. The woodcock leaves the Island shores at the end of October and returns the first of April. They start laying eggs about April 10th. After the severe setback received in Louisiana, the birds were subjected to another reverse after returning to this Province when their newly hatched eggs were destroyed by the severe snow storm during the latter part of April. Messrs. Howard Mendal and Clarence Alldus of the Biology department of the University of Maine, and Mr. Joseph I. Stickney, director of that state's fish and game department are now in the Maritimes conducting a survey of game birds. They were expected to reach the Island yesterday but experienced car trouble in Amherst, N. S. and wired that they will come to the Island on the first boat this morning. While here they will investigate conditions of woodcock, geese and brant in the Province.

Name The Cake Contest

The Millers of MAPLE LEAF FLOUR will shortly announce exclusively for the women of Prince Edward Island a "Name The Cake Contest" in which twenty-five prizes are to be given away including a Chesterfield Suite a 50 piece Cabinet of Silverware, a 42 piece English Dinnerware Set, a Tea Waggon, an Occasional Chair and 20 other beautiful and useful prizes.

If you would like to win one of these prizes, here is all you have to do. Go to your dealer and purchase a bag of MAPLE LEAF FLOUR. To each bag is attached a coupon with all details and on which you write your suggested name for the cake.

If you buy a 24 lb. bag you are allowed to make one suggestion, with a 98-lb. bag you are allowed four suggestions but you can send in as many coupons as you like until the close of the campaign June 22nd.

A committee of prominent, local citizens will award the prizes on the twenty-five suggestions which in their opinions they think are the best, so that everyone living in Prince Edward Island will have an equal chance to win one of the major prizes. But in addition to these twenty-five prizes everyone entering the contest will receive by return mail a copy of Anna Lee Scott's new Cook Book entitled "51 Ways to a Man's Heart", a useful and economical book which every housewife will be delighted to have.

Watch this newspaper for further announcements of one of the most practical and ambitious advertising propositions ever offered solely to the housewives of Prince Edward Island.

In Memoriam

MISS KATHERINE M. DOCKERTY

Miss Katherine M. Dockerty, daughter of the late Donald and Jessie Panting Dockerty, died on May 4th after a brief illness at her home in Cardigan. Born in Belfast in 1857, she moved in early childhood to Cardigan where she spent a long and usual life. When others of the large family scattered to start new homes near and far, Katherine was the one who stayed and tenderly cared for her father and mother in their declining years. Her gentle ministrations comforted also the two brothers, who had remained at home, through their last illnesses.

Miss Dockerty loved her home and took great pride in keeping it a beautiful and beloved gathering place for relatives and friends. Blessed with good health, she was active until three weeks before her death. Even in her 82nd year for gifts she designed and hooked a number of mats with lovely colorings dyed by herself, and of excellent workmanship, which are prized now for remembrance by relatives and friends.

She leaves to mourn one sister, Mrs. George E. Goff, Charlottetown; two brothers, Daniel and John D. Malcolm, Cardigan; also nieces and nephews in many parts of Canada and the United States.

Commodore Norah

By ANGUS MacVICAR

A WOMAN INTERVENES

The strikers were quiet for a moment. Then a hoarse voice cut across the silence.

"She's trying to bluff us. She's no intentions o' having a conference."

"That's right," shouted Red-head. "We want you to give us better conditions—now, Norah Grant. We've waited long enough."

She looked down at them. Anger and a bitter disappointment surged in her heart. Why couldn't they trust her word. She wondered what her father would say when he heard of this. Would he consider her a failure? And wouldn't David McGregor laugh at her discomfiture!

With sudden energy she stepped back and slammed down the window.

"Norah!" exclaimed Archie. "You can't——"

He stopped abruptly. A man in the crowd had picked up a stone and had thrown it against the window. It fell into the dining-room with a tinkle of broken glass. This single missile was followed by a shower of stones and clods.

Norah caught her breath and pressed back against one wall, out of range of the flying glass. Menteith cowered behind the armchair. Archie ran to the telephone to ask for more police, but he could get no answer. It occurred to him that the strikers had cut the wires.

There was a thunderous knocking on the front door. From the drawing-room on the other side of the hall there was the sound of more breaking glass.

Watching the surging crowd of men in front of the house, watching the vain efforts of the two policemen to keep order, Norah suddenly saw an extraordinary thing. A woman—tall, angular, wearing a severely-cut dark costume and an old-fashioned hat—appeared among the crowd of fishermen. She was thrusting her way through it with vigour and determination, and the men fell back as she advanced. Some of them rather awkwardly raised their caps.

She entered the garden. By this time the jacket of her suit lacked several buttons, and her hat had slipped to the side of her head, but on her face was a look of grim purpose.

"Stop all this nonsense!" she cried to the men who were throwing stones at the house. "What do you mean?"

She looked up at the broken window of the dining-room and glimpsed Norah.

"Come out, Norah Grant!" she commanded. "I want to talk to you, and to these men. I guarantee you won't be molested while I am here."

The fishermen were staring at her as if they could not believe their eyes. Her presence seemed to have caused their anger to evaporate.

"It's—it's Miss McGregor," muttered Archie. "You'd better go and speak to her, Norah."

Menteith lit another cigarette.

* * * * * * *

After having given David his lunch and seeing him off for the night's fishing, Miss McGregor had gone to ask for Jock Galbraith, who was in bed, still running a slight influenza temperature. It was from Jock, who had been visited in the morning by old Donald Brown, that she had learned of the serious aspect of the strike among Norah's crews.

Later on, when shopping, she was told of Norah's threat to dismiss her men and engage outsiders to man her shiffs.

Then, late in the evening, Miss McGregor heard of the march of the strikers, their pursuit of Menteith, and their angry demonstration outside Norah's house. Almost immediately she made up her mind to interfere in the dispute.

Her motives were not altogether clear, even to herself, but it had occurred to her that if she could quell the strikers' indignation and enforce a settlement between them and their mistress, Norah Grant might, out of a sense of gratitude, be persuaded to consider an agreement with David as well. Her nephew, when he returned from the fishing, might blame her for having taken matters into her own hands, but she was confident that she could over-ride his objections, and once she got him and Norah actually together, she wasn't in the least afraid of the outcome. That was one vague notion in her mind.

Another was less personal. If this strike proved successful, then it was almost certain that there would be many more in the future among the Invercon fishermen, and that would mean that the trusting friendliness between master and man, which, though it can be dispensed with in a factory or coal mine, is so necessary for success in the fishing industry, would disappear, and Invercon might lose its prosperity as a herring port.

Besides all this, Miss McGregor was sorry for Norah Grant, a young girl beset by the twin problems of rebellious crews and her own pride. She felt that she could not leave her face the trouble unaided. The Grants might be her enemies, but she had enough human sympathy to put the fact aside.

She put on her jacket and hat and sallied forth. Through the strikers she had passed, without a moment's thought for her own safety, and they had allowed her to gain her purpose, quieted by her calm courage and determination.

ENEMY PROTECTION

She stood now below the dining-room window, and commanded Norah to come out. The strikers stood round her in a rough semi-circle and waited, suspicious of what was going to happen.

The front door opened. Norah, her head thrown back defiantly, her cheeks flushed with excitement, came out on the lawn and stood beside Miss McGregor. Archie, her brother, appeared behind her on the doorstep. He caught Donald Brown's eye among the crowd, and the boy and the old man grinned rather sheepishly at each other.

Menteith remained in the dining-room, concealing himself from the window as best he might.

Red-head took a step forward towards the two women—one stiff, straight and calm like a general; the other young, pretty and uncertain of her ground.

"Well, what d'you want to say to us?" he asked, his forehead puckering.

At first Miss McGregor appeared to be unaware of Norah's presence by her side. She began to speak, first in a low voice, then louder and more authoritatively.

"Listen all you men," she said. "Violence will never get you anywhere. You know quite well that I am no friend of the Grants, and that I have no axe to grind. I am talking to you for your own sakes, as well as for the sake of Norah Grant, who stands here alone, a young slip of a girl, against fifty angry men. I came to protect her from your stupid violence, because she is a woman—not because she is a Grant. And I came to protect you men from yourselves, because if you go on in this idiotic way you will find Invercon invaded by strangers, who will take away your jobs and ruin the happiness and prosperity that has been ours until this time."

She paused and looked about her. None of the younger men said a word. They recognized the old lady's sincerity and the inherent justice of her arguments. They were taken aback, too, by her confident and fearless bearing. Old Donald, however, saw an opportunity to lower still further the temperature of the gathering.

"Arabella McGregor is right," he said, loud enough for all to hear. "It's no' fair o' us to be bullying a girl."
