BUILDING HOUSES IN THREE WEEKS.

A correspondent, writing from Brussels, says the Belgians never speak of a devastated area today, but "reconstructed area."

The very upheaval of the land, it appears, has been decidedly beneficial to agriculture, excepting in places where the shell-fire did its work too well and ploughed up the unlovely-looking blue-grey patches among the rich loam of the fields.

The ground is practically all cleared—a long job, when it is remembered that the engineers had to scour the place for "surprises" and traps that were left to blow the unwary to smithereens.

Shells were exploded and barbed wire gathered into immense coils, that still lie there like untidy heaps of twine.

Bricks are plentiful in Flanders, but water is scarce. It has been remarked, Light railways were constructed, and everything being ready, an entirely new city was planned in places where nothing of the original town was left.

Patching up Most Difficult. If the work is comparatively easy in the case of a new town, near but not on the site of an old one, the patching up of half-ruined buildings is more difficult.

Down by the French frontier, at Verdun, Comines, and Warstein, there is still much to be done. Corrugated iron shelters still abound, while traces of the vindictive spirit, in which the damage was perpetrated are still apparent.

Right through the worst area, near the French border, only one flower-covered house was seen. From afar the pink roses floated in the sun, and everyone said "Behold the optimist."

A rug, as a gift makes a room as snug as a bug in a rug.
