The Maximum of Security

When knowledge, experience and caution be brought to bear upon their selection, Real Estate Mortgages afford investors the maximum of security. Over twenty-six million dollars of this Corporation's investments are in first mortgages on carefully selected improved real estate securities. These mortgages number 15,590, an average of $1,488 each, the securities therefore chiefly consisting of cultivated farm lands and residences of moderate size and cost in our leading cities. It is in these that the funds entrusted to our care by our debenture-holders are invested, thus assuring SAFETY OF PRINCIPAL AND CERTAINTY OF INTEREST.

SANDRA THE JEALOUS By Jane Phelps

EVERETT AND SANDRA GO SHOPPING CHAPTER XXIII As I leaned back in the luxurious town car Everett had given me for my very own I muttered: "What do I care whether he is pleased or not? Yet I knew I did care, and the fact that, a moment after I had made the hasty exclamation, I was certainly examining my face with a hand mirror to see if I really did look well, proved that I did. Inconsistent, yes. But was ever seventeen consistent? Everett was waiting for me, although I was exactly on time. He complimented me saying: "Many women think ten or fifteen minutes one way or another makes no difference. But men like promptness. I am glad you have that virtue among your other ones." It wasn't a very intimate speech; but I was glad he was pleased with me. He then asked that they show me the coat. The coat was perfectly lovely! A sapphire blue velvet with a sable collar. It was awfully becoming. But I winced when he said: "I knew it would be! Sapphire is always becoming to people with your colored hair." Had Leola worn sapphire velvet too? I gasped when I knew the cost, but Everett never said a word. Just said to send it as soon as possible. A slight change was necessary in the collar or we might have taken it. "You were very lovely in it, Sandra," he said when we left the store. Now go and buy yourself some books and magazines. I should like to go with you, but haven't the time." As he turned away after assisting me into the car, my eyes filled. I couldn't have told just why, but something in his voice, his eyes as he told me I was lovely in the coat, made me think he was sorry for me, and so made me sorry for myself. But I brushed them quickly away and spent an hour selecting reading matter. I wished I knew the kind of books he liked. I must ask then I could occasionally buy him one. "When he came home to dinner I was curled up on the rug in front of the fire place reading. "Purring just like a kitten," he said as he kissed me and helped me to my feet. He looked at the book I was reading, then at the others I had bought, and selecting one said he should take possession of it, as he had wanted to read it ever since he had read the reviews. I was pleased out of all proportion to the incident. But that he would read anything I had selected, made me think I was not so hopelessly childish as he usually made me feel. I did so want him to treat me like a grown-up. He took me to the theatre that night, and never said a cross or impatient word. "Perhaps he does love me a little," I said to myself, "and so is sorry for me." Had I known that for weary weeks and months I was to blow hot and blow cold over the question of Everett's feelings for me I should not have known how to endure my life. But I was of an optimistic nature, and it took very little to encourage me to think as I wanted to think. It is so easy to fool ourselves if we really try. Had I known that even then Everett was discovering that I was not as young as he had thought—not a child; but a grown girl, almost a woman. That he also thought me

Profuse Apologies Are Due Snakes

Since the Bolsheviks first startled the world with their shout "Self-determination for the fish!" and tore down the diams that were confining their prototypes, we have come across a few more curious declarations than those which aim to protect snakes. They come from Australia, California and several other places where it has been discovered that the snake is not exactly the enemy to mankind that has been supposed, but really a benefactor. Australia has taken steps to protect her snakes because her enormous quantities of grain stores during the war helped bring on a plague of vermin, and investigation proved that the greatest enemy of the rodents is the snake. In California the snake abates the gopher pest, which is a serious problem for agriculturists. Washington has announced that there is such a formidable enemy of the rat as the snake and the amount of destruction caused annually by vermin is perhaps second only among preventable losses, to that of fire. Several states, in appreciation of these facts, intend to pass laws which will protect all snakes but rattlers, copperheads, and some other varieties known to be poisonous.

In Defence of Snakes.

This has proved very cheering and stimulating to Dr. W. H. Ballou, a noted American author, mycologist, ichthyologist and general friend of reptiles and wild creatures, and he comes enthusiastically to the defence of the snake in the New York Sun. The only fault Dr. Ballou finds with the movement to discriminate against snakes is that it appears to discriminate against the poisonous varieties. "Why," asks Dr. Ballou "not protect the poisonous species?" One is rather at a loss of an answer and can only fall back on the old argument that bites from poisonous snakes are always painful and often fatal; but Dr. Ballou points out that in India, where poisonous snakes abound in a large proportion of the population goes barefooted, only about 20,000 lives a year are lost owing to snake bites. Moreover, records of fatal snake bites are rare in the United States and Canada, although both have poisonous snakes, the United States especially. Indeed, the only large country in warm or temperate latitudes that is entirely without poisonous reptiles is Madagascar. And what has Madagascar done in the great war? Very little indeed.

Fun With Snakes.

"Rattlers amuse me," says Dr. Ballou, "while other people would rather read a book or see a show. I tie my silk handkerchief to one end of a stick and let them strike with their fangs. When their poison is discharged they come down immediately to the harmless rank." What he does very lovely, with the promise of greater beauty when more mature, it would have comforted me immensely. I did realize in a way that he was rather proud of me. He couldn't hide that. But I laid it all to his taste in dressing me for that was what he did. Altho he never objected when I wore one of my simple rouseau dresses in the house; he did object once when I wore one when going to the theatre with him. "They were all right for Lakeville, and are perfectly appropriate for home wear. But I can afford handsome clothes for you. Why shouldn't you have them?" I didn't say anything, but I too thought, why not? I was all I did have—what his money bought me. That other woman, Leola, had his love. So I soon developed extravagant tastes. It does not make a woman long when she is given carte blanche to learn the gentle art of spending money. At least I never have met a woman who wasted much time over that particular reason. I was often so lonely and unhappy because of the thought of Leola I would spend my time in shopping. It made me forget her, aside from the pleasure it gave me. Yet no saleswoman ever recommended a hat, a dress or anything else with the remark that it would be becoming because of my hair, that I did not at once lose all interest in the article I had intended to purchase, and leave the shop empty handed. Often and often I wished that Everett had not said that he had been attracted to me because I had hair like Leola; the woman who had drowned herself rather than have him disgrace her before the world. The woman I was sure he still loved. Had he not said that I think I could perhaps soon have forgotten and forgiven all the rest; but that rankled, I became more and more in love with my husband, the hurt was sometimes almost more than I could bear. Tomorrow—Sandra is Received by Everett's Friends

On Wednesday evening the Red Cross of Dunstaffnage met at the home of Mr. Scott Cairns, to welcome his sister, Nurse Margaret Cairns, back from France, where she was serving with the American army. After games and music furnished by Mrs. J. T. Ferguson, Mrs. Herbert Thompson and others, a dainty luncheon was served. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Elliot of Boston, a sister of Mr. Cairns. After singing God Save the King and My Country 'Tis of Thee, the ladies presented Miss Cairns with an address and $10 in gold. Following is the address: Dear Miss Cairns.—It is a great pleasure to welcome you back to your old home, if even for a short time. Memories of old associations between you and your friends here are certainly very pleasant. We only wish that you could make your home amongst us again, and form part of our community life. Since leaving us you have had a great experience—one which you will never forget. You have certainly done your part in connection with the war in which our civilized nations have been engaged against the forces of oppression and tyranny. Your work has been most important, along with thousands of Red Cross nurses, you have been ministering to our wounded in France and Belgium. We would in fact be proud of were not the United States Army and our Canadian army as one. Yours was indeed a high calling, for you went to France not to destroy men's lives, but to save them. Our great victory was in a large measure the result of self-denying efforts and ministrations, as our Red Cross army continually extended. We are proud of our boys who risked everything, even life itself, for their country. You are no less proud of our Red Cross nurses who also risked everything to restore our wounded and comfort our dying. We were therefore heartily glad that you were able to pay a next with his handkerchief he does not say, but relates the interesting fact that he has seen a blacksnake coil round the neck of a rattler and strangle it, and later on a little king snake come along and do the same to the black snake—with a difference. When the black snake is choked it pretends to be dead, and the gratified king snake enters and departs. Then the black snake scurries away, well pleased with its innocent stratagem. The authority tells us that Central American Indians are expert at catching big snakes for zoological collections and museums. On one occasion in Honduras he saw hanging from a tree a huge boa constrictor ready to coil around any animal that passed underneath. One of the natives detached himself from the rest and walked under the snake. Instantly it loosed itself and coiled around him; but the native thrust his knife into the boa's throat and Dr. Ballou had a fine specimen.

Humanity's Debt to Snakes.

Dr. Ballou contends that snakes were created for a definite, useful purpose, and that without them mankind could hardly exist. The true function of the snake is to keep down an excess of predatory insects, birds, mammals and other reptiles. So devoted is the snake to this work in the interest of mankind that in swallowing rodents which carry disease germs it frequently makes the supreme sacrifice itself. Another debt we owe to the poisonous snake is the hypodermic needle. The first of these needles was found in the snake's jaw the beautiful—to Dr. Ballou—hollow and hinged bone that so deftly squirts the interesting venom into the flesh of the prey. In defence of snake poison it ought to be said that it is not poisonous when swallowed, though we must admit we cannot imagine anyone swallowing it for any other reason than its supposed lethal qualities. Moreover, though snakes do sometimes kill things including human beings that we should like to see spared the great bulk of their normal diet is composed of creatures we are better without. Even the deadly copperhead apportions birds but 2 per cent. of its menu.

Department With Snakes.

Don't be scared at hissing, squirming adders, advises Dr. Ballou. Step right up to them and they will collapse. Only a pilot snake will follow you if you run, but if you show fight it will turn and flee. This species alone will spring at you if on an elevation of rocks, where it can get a good take-off. It is not really a fighter, but has probably found that by such bluffs it makes life easier. The mountain pilot is nothing but a black snake, the largest, thickest and heaviest found in the northern sections of the United States. This is said to ally apprehension. Another fighter is the south-eastern diamond-backed rattler, which is found in Florida, and which, no doubt, attracts many people like Dr. Ballou to the fashionable hotels at Palm Beach, Sea Breeze and similar resorts. Be prepared for a fight when you meet him, and carry a stout stick equipped with a loop of wire at the end. This is intended to cast around the neck of the snake that he may be necked snugly in your trunk.

A LOSS TO AMERICAN LETTERS.

John Fox, Jr., who died at a comparatively early age the other day, was a writer of rare and delicate charm, whose books, particularly "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come" and "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine," had many admiring readers in Canada. He made an attempt to write the Great American Novel, for which the country has waited vainly. Perhaps it is a task even beyond genius to combine on one canvas all the colors of life on a continent. The United States is such a composite of races, and even the native stock has been so modified by dispersal over a vast area under varied physical conditions, that the typical American has ceased to exist. But there are local types and there is local color, and John Fox turned on them an affectionate eye in the portions of the country he knew and loved. He was at home in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia, especially in the mountain regions. He reproduced their atmosphere and primitive life, and drew the portraits of their people, with a caressing hand and a delightful literary touch, guided by keen observation and a fine gift of story-telling. He has done for this section of the south what William Dean Howells and Mary Wilkins have done for New England, but there was more sense of poetry in his work than in their, sharp-edged realism. There is no fiction in Canada of the same kind or quality, though the materials have lain all around us plentiful and inviting as those which Fox turned to such attractive use. The literary genius of this country has gone mainly into poetry, a field in which we can fairly challenge comparison with our neighbors, at least in the past generation. Parkman put the romance of early Canada into the glowing pages of his history, but there are great undeveloped riches for the novelist in the maritime provinces, the Quebec, and the Ontario of a later period. CEMENT TILE FOR DRAINAGE Cement tile are as good as clay tile if well made. Cement tile should be made of one part of cement and three parts of coarse, well-graded sand, screened through a sieve with meshes measuring one-half the thickness of the wall of the tile. They should be cured slowly and thoroughly. Cement tile made poorly or from poor materials tend to go to pieces in acid or strong alkali soils. Good tile give a clear metallic ring when lightly tapped with a hammer. They should be dense, hard and non-porous. Buy your tile of a reliable firm.

Parkman put the romance of early Canada into the glowing pages of his history, but there are great undeveloped riches for the novelist in the maritime provinces, the Quebec, and the Ontario of a later period. CEMENT TILE FOR DRAINAGE Cement tile are as good as clay tile if well made. Cement tile should be made of one part of cement and three parts of coarse, well-graded sand, screened through a sieve with meshes measuring one-half the thickness of the wall of the tile. They should be cured slowly and thoroughly. Cement tile made poorly or from poor materials tend to go to pieces in acid or strong alkali soils. Good tile give a clear metallic ring when lightly tapped with a hammer. They should be dense, hard and non-porous. Buy your tile of a reliable firm.
