THEY HAD TO SEE PARIS
By Homer Croy

And Pike's little dream god ran before him, beckoning sweetly. Nobody in the Peters family was more astonished than Mrs. Peters herself. She had placed implicit confidence in Pike's word about the wells and now she mentioned to Pike the fact that he had been wrong about the well, but it did not humble the shameless creature.

"Mrs. Knagg: Before we were married you said you would give the biggest part of your life to live the rest of it with me.
Mr. Knagg: I know I did but I find that I've reserved too long a portion to be lived with you."

"Isn't he prematurely bald?"
"Not for a married man."

"Why did you never marry?"
"I don't feel that I could support a wife."
"Don't let that worry you. If she finds you can't she'll leave you."

world. The children must have their chance."
"Sure, give 'em anything they want—only I've noticed that most children who have anything they want don't want anything but devilry and idleness, and usually end by being about as much account as a cracked spark plug. Look at the sons of the big millionaires. Why, you could shoot 'em, and nobody'd be sorry except a string of chorus girls. This is a workingman's country and I don't believe in this idleness business."
"That's all true, but we want our children to meet the right kind of people—we want to give them culture and refinement and travel, make them citizens of the world."
Also the trip was to do Pike good. Sometimes Mrs. Peters felt ashamed of him. But she did not use the word culture. Instead she thought of it for him as a "broader outlook," a "different point of view," and a "new experience."

"Well, all right if you want to," said Pike. "Go ahead and do whatever you like. I'll live down at the hotel."
"I want you to go, too."
"Me? I can't go. I've got to stay here. Now's my big chance."
"But I want you to go. I won't go without you. And you can go—you said you had fixed up a deal for a new office manager."
It was a hard blow to Pike. He loved his family, "Idy," in his eyes, was as near perfection as a human being could be and now he must decide.

"We really owe it to Opal," urged Mrs. Peters
What Mrs. Peters was really thinking was: "There she can meet somebody who will be a credit to her. Some rich American of fine family." And then a wild preposterous dream floated through her mind: "Maybe a count."
But of course she didn't put it into words. Being a woman she said:
"She can learn French and go to the Louver," and she pronounced it that way. "Think of how many American girls go each year. Why shouldn't Opal have just as good a chance as anybody? And then there's Ross—we should get him away from that Jones girl."

Pike held the cigar in his hand while a tiny wisp of blue drifted away and on it went his dreams.
"How long would you stay?"
A year maybe. Please, Pike. You'll see I am right. I want to go to Paris."
Pike was stunned. Paris. It seemed as far away as Halley's comet.
"What do I want to go to Paris for? I'd like to, take it in sometime when I'm sixty or seventy and not now. Why, I'm just in my prime! Pick out anybody in this town and let him follow me for a week and you got a hospital case on your hands. Hell's huckleberry! If I couldn't work, you might just as well select the lilies. I had a Frenchman working in the garage once—French Johnny, they called him—and he knewed about as much about machinery as I do about Chinese chop-sticks. Say, what'd he do one day?—put a crank-case on and left a spanner in it! Fact. If he's a sample of the French, I wouldn't walk across the street to see all Paris."

"Please Pike," she said again, and put her hand on his.
"All right, Mummie, if you got your heart set on it."
"I knew you would," cried Mrs. Peters joyfully and patted Pike's long hand. "I am so glad. You won't regret it."
Mrs. Peters felt a throbbing joy which she hadn't known in years—a joy exceeding and surpassing even the joy of the announcement that the well was a gusher. Her mind danced on ahead. What a splendid, wonderful time they would have.
"I suppose I owe it to them," Pike thought on his way to the office. "You got to humor women-folks sometimes." It was his way of explaining the vagaries of that queer section of the human race. "A year ain't very long, after all," he added wistfully.

ABNEY AND VICINITY

Probably the largest number of cases of measles at one time is being reported here now. There is also one case of diphtheria.

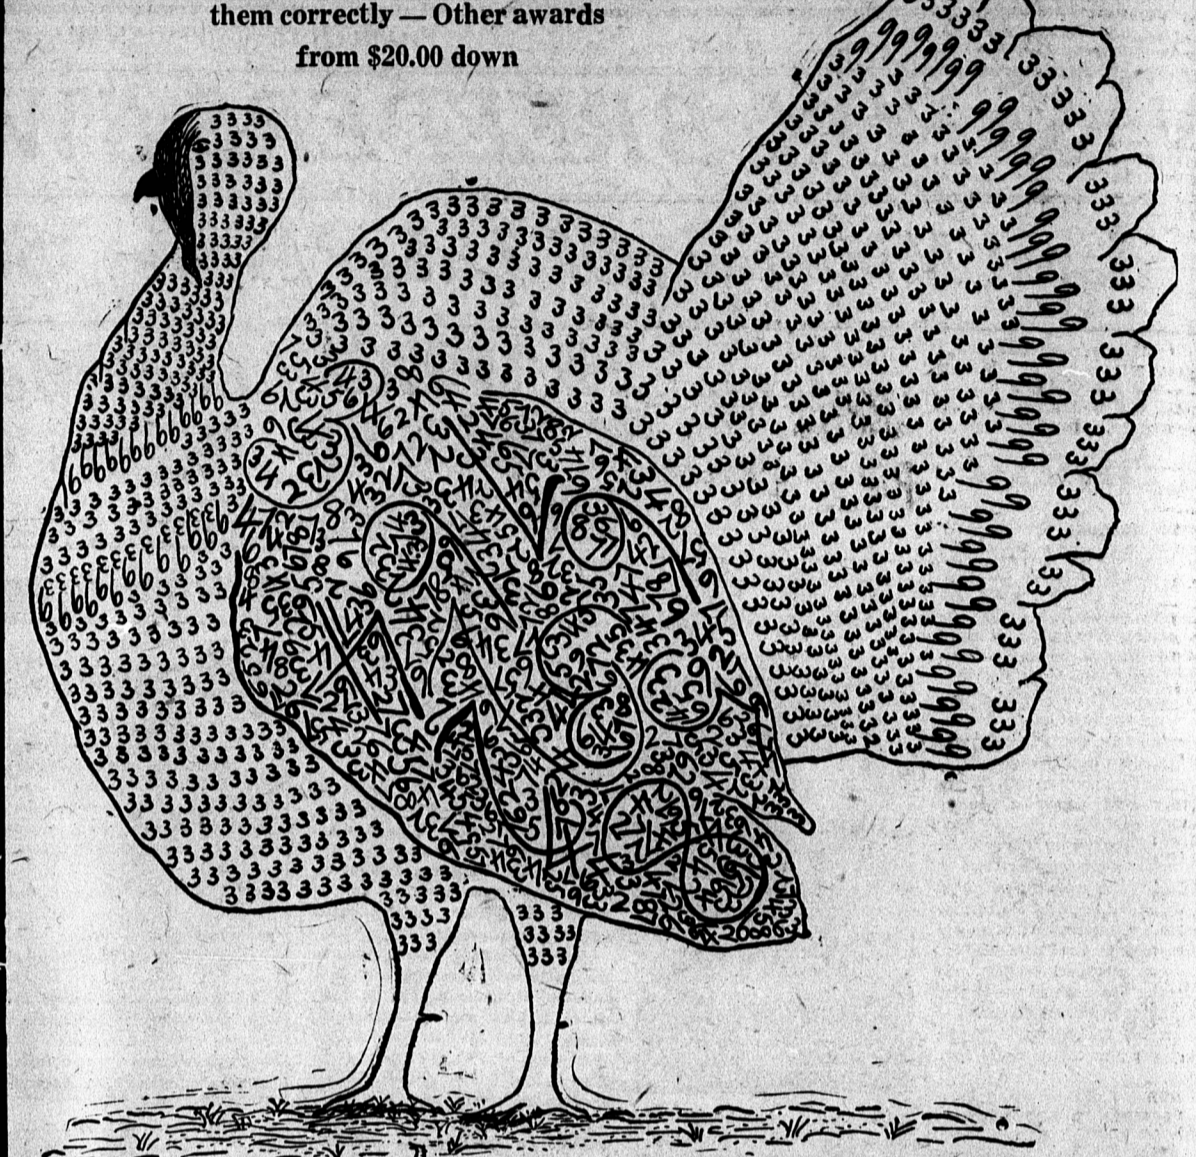

Mr. Freeman Buell and Miss Annie Laura Beck were recently united in marriage. We wish Mr. and Mrs. Buell much happiness in their new home. This makes the fourth marriage to take place within the past couple of months, and a pleasant feature of those marriages is that the couples have all settled down in their own native place of birth.

Healed by Cuticura.

"I had a rash break out on my face and arms. It was very red and itched so much that I scratched it, which seemed to make it worse. My clothing aggravated the breaking out on my arms. I hated to go any place on account of it."
"I tried many remedies but they did not do any good. I read an advertisement for Cuticura Soap and Ointment so purchased some and I was completely healed after using two cakes of Cuticura Soap and one box of Cuticura Ointment." (Signed) Miss May Pomer, R. R. 3, Woodstock, Ont.
