MOUJIK QUARTERS AT VLADIVOSTOK.

Vladivostok, the nearest approach to a Pacific port left to the Russians, is one of the most picturesque places in the world. Its houses are built on the edges of cliffs, and the front door frequently opens on a level street, while a drop of a hundred feet yawns just back of the rear entrance. The moujiks, or Russian peasants, have crowded into Vladivostok from fear of the Japanese and, their quarters are shown in the illustration. The Russian peasant lives very intimately with his family livestock, and in the photograph the peasants are shown carrying in by certain domestic animals domiciled inside the house itself.

More Than Son of His Father.

The news that a son of Sir Edmund Barton, the first Premier of federated Australia, and now Chief Justice of the Commonwealth, has been selected as the Cecil Rhodes scholar of New South Wales, is interesting on grounds of heredity. Sir Edmund had a remarkably brilliant career at the Sydney University, winning two of the most valuable scholarships and the university prize for all-round distinction, and graduating with first-class honors. By a provision of the New South Wales Constitution Act, the University of Sydney became entitled to send a member to Parliament whom it had 100 graduates on its roll. Sir Edmund was the second and last member for the Sydney University. A Reform Act abolished university representation as inconsistent with Australian democratic conditions; but Sir Edmund had no difficulty in finding another seat.—London Chronicle.

TWO HOMES.

My home was in the island that we love, set in the seas. The heaven alternates smiles and frowns above.

The stately trees Beset the hedgerows, and the fields are gay With blossom-store; While still the grey sea washes, night and day, The whitewashed shore.

My home is in the solemn, wide Karoo, The boundless veldt. Spanned o'er with infinite dome of stables blue. Here have I dwelt Until the giant hills, the arid plain Of sand and stone. The thorny bush, adorned for passing rain, Are benedictive grown.

Sometimes my heart looks back, and yearning cries To seek once more The fragrant hedgerows and the changing skies.

The lanes of yore, And then the wide, wide veldt, far stretched below. Holds me with mighty arms, and whispers, "Lo, I am thy home."

—Anna Howarth, in The Spectator, Exmoor, Kilmegon, Cape Colony.

Flogging in the Army.

A somewhat antiquated story has gained currency to the effect that a man who recently came into the Church Army's Home at Bow was found to have a representation of the Crucifixion tattooed on his back in the belief that if ordered for punishment the sight of such a design would save him from stripes. He must have been a very old soldier indeed to have entertained such a notion.

Flogging in the British Army was abolished some thirty years ago, and is now never practiced, except in military prisons. The case of a refractory or malingering soldier in prison would be investigated by a board of officers, and a certain number of lashes might be ordered, just as in certain civil cases.

During the war in America soldiers were frequently found to have the Crucifixion tattooed on the arm, but rather as a charm than as a specific.

One of the last cases of flogging in the British Army was that of a man at York, who had been guilty of desertion, and was an altogether mauvais sujet. He was one of the Queen's bad bargains. Nowadays, the same kind of impossible person, on committing any such offences as striking an officer, is sentenced to a term of imprisonment with hard labor.

"Soldiers," said our informant, "are now more enlightened than formerly, and would not entertain such a superstition for a moment. Only ignorant men could have believed in it at any time."

Clothing as Physical Records.

An excellent illustration of the value of records has been afforded lately regarding the question of physical degeneracy. A firm in the north of England has compared the measurements for clothing made two generations ago with those of to-day, the results going to show that chest and hip measurements are now three inches on the average more than they were sixty years ago. This same conclusion is reached by the experience of the ready-made clothing trade. These facts, whatever may be their generality, do not quite dispose of the question of degeneracy. They are what we should expect from the more abundant and cheaper food of the people, their better housing and improved sanitary surroundings, but the testimony regarding the unfavourable of recruits and progressive lack of stamina in town and especially manufacturing populations cannot be disregarded.—London Telegraph.

Dr. J. P. MURRAY,

Opp Frowse Bros, 300-302 St. John St.

Lord Charles Bessford tells a funny story about his stay at a country inn near the city of Oxford. His Lordship arrived over-night quite alone and told his host who he was. That worthy thus admonished the hot water boy:

"Look here," he said earnestly "we have got a Lord here—a real live Lord. We never had one here before, and I don't suppose we ever will again. When you take His Lordship's water up in the morning knock several times, and if a voice says 'Who is it?' mind you say, 'It's the boy, me Lord.'"

The unfortunate boy was so much flustered, however, next morning that, shivering outside the door with his hot water, when Lord Charles cried, "Who is it?" he blurted out, "It's the Lord, me boy."

Wood Ashes For Hogs.

Wood ashes and charcoal should always be where the hogs can get to them. An excellent charcoal is burnt corn-cobs. Hogs relish them and thrive upon them. Hogs need as much salt as do other animals. It ought to be kept in the end of the trough at all times, where all the herd can have constant access to it. The farmer who will pay attention to these two things in the management of his animals will have less cholera among his swine than his neighbors who pay no attention to such details.

Y., for medical advice, which is given free. Correspondence is held strictly confidential.
