DAUGHTER OF EXILE

By ALEXANDER CAMPBELL

"MR. SHANE WILL BE OUR GUEST"

When the door had closed behind her there was a silence. Pelmann frowned down on the green blotter.

"It is true," he said gravely. "She is growing up. I had not noticed it."

"I had," said Heinrich with emphasis.

"What do you mean?"

"There are two young men in the neighbourhood," said Heinrich slowly. "They are boarders with Captain Peter Macpherson, at the place called The Lighthouse. One of them is called Shane. He is an artist. The other is called Halford. I do not know what he is. Both these young men have displayed a considerable interest in our little Martha."

"So!" Pelmann looked suddenly worried. "And she——?"

"She was indifferent to Halford. But she seems to have taken a liking to Shane. He is an attractive young man."

Pelmann drummed agitatedly on the desk. "It is natural, I suppose. She is young—beautiful, too, I think. And, perhaps, no longer a child. Yes, it is natural. But these two young men —do you think they might be—dangerous?"

Heinrich stared straight ahead of him. "I have not told you this before because I did not want to worry you. As for the two young men, they may be perfectly harmless. On the other hand —the Dictator has many agents, and they are clever men."

He paused. "This Shane," he said deliberately, "speaks like a genuine Englishman. One would, however, expect that. He has fair hair and blue eyes —the perfect Aryan. It may mean nothing. On the other hand, one cannot tell."

"And the other fellow—Halford?"

"He is English. The lower-middle class type. I would not rate his mental powers very highly. Or his nerve. But the lion has its jackal."

He paused. "To-day Shane accompanied us in the car to Stornoway. I tried to rebuff him, but Martha insisted on him coming. I believe he went to return a suitcase which he took from the hotel by mistake, but that may have been a subterfuge. In Stornoway he met a man —an Irishman. He looked a fool, but I distrust amiable Irishmen who look like fools. He might be worth investigating."

Pelmann drew on his cheroot. His high forehead was wrinkled in thought.

"I should like to meet these young men—both of them. If there is danger, we might as well face it. Supposing one of them is a secret agent, he will jump at the chance to gain admittance to the house. We might trap him into saying something."

Heinrich looked startled. "That is a bold course. But it might have its adventage, Herr Professor. Yes, it is a plan. How are we going to manage it without arousing their suspicions?"

"I dont know yet," said Pelmann thoughtfully. 'But it should not be too difficult."

Heinrich said: "Shane has promised to paint Martha's portrait. They are meeting to-morrow."

"So!" said Pelmann. "He does not waste time, that one! But two can play at that game. We don't waste time either. I shall ask Martha to bring him to lunch. Then we shall see."

"He might recognize you," said the giant. "Don't forget that so far as They are concerned you are supposed to be dead."

"If he is one of their agents, then they already know I am not dead," declared Pelmann. "And it is up to us to find out what their next move is going to be."

He stubbed out his cheroot. "Mr. Shane will be our guest to lunch to-morrow. If he is the innocent artist he makes himself out to be, no harm will be done. If he is not—we shall at least know who is our enemy."

Outside the house, not a breath of wind disturbed the stillness. The birds on the cliffs slept peacefully. The moon's white light was cut off behind a cloud ,and a blanket of darkness lay over the moor and the murmuring sea. Farther along the shore, the old lighthouse which Captain Peter MacPherson had made his home gleamed ghostly white in the darkness. No lights showed. The occupants were presumably asleep.

But at least one of them was still awake. One of the windows that faced the sea was gently raised. A torch flashed across the waters, dotting and dashing a message in a code that was not Morse.

It ceased, and for a few minutes nothing happened. Then out at sea a tiny pin-point of light flashed in and out, conveying a reply. It came from the Lilie. the foreign trawler which Shane had been watching.

The first message ran:—

"Must see you. Urgent. Important news."

The reply read:—

"To-morrow afternoon. The church at Ness."

Halford gently eased down the window sash, laid aside the torch, and slipped into bed. He had had to wait several hours, until he was sure the captain and Shane were safely asleep, before he dared send the message. He was suffering from the reaction of a futile attempt at murder, and he was very tired.

CHAPTER VIII

INVITATION TO LUNCH

Shane rose early the next day and went to keep his appointment with Martha. He was feeling very lighthearted.

Before going to sleep he had wrestled with the problem presented by the incident on the cliff top, when Halford's apparent clumsiness had almost cost Shane his life. If the man had not stumbled, but had really attempted to push him over the clifff, as Shane more than half suspected, what action should he take?

Shane decided that he could do nothing. If he accused Halford, the man would deny it, and Shane had no proof.

Halford had retold the story of an accident in the presence of the captain. He had slipped on the rocky path, he said. He made a great show of fussing over Shane. He had apologised to Macpherson for the loss of his telescope. The captain had appeared to accept the story. Shane had said nothing which might arouse the captain's suspicions.

Work of British and Foreign Bible Society

DR. J. H. AYERS GIVES REPORT OF EXECUTIVE OF BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY IN CANADA AND NEWFOUNDLAND.

Although the publication of this report has been delayed altogether too long, yet for the benefit of those who are interested Supporters of the Bible Society's work in this Province, it is perhaps better late than not at all.

The meeting of the Executive took place on March 17th, in the Upper Canada Bible House, Toronto.

A full attendance of representatives from the fifteen Auxiliaries was recorded.

The most important item of business was the Annual Report, submitted by the General Secretary—Rev. J. B. M. Armour, M. A., one paragraph of which might be quoted here, because of its application to the work of the Society in this Island Province.

"That in the work of the Auxiliaries especially that carried on by the District Secretaries, he was still convinced that through personal contact with the Branches, the best results were assured. yet he felt that each Auxiliary, in view of present changing conditions, should study carefully its present methods and adopt any new ways of promoting the work which would be consistant with the fundamental principal on which the Society was founded, whilst ever maintaining the simplicity and dignity of appeal that had ever characterized the Society since its foundation in 1804. Also that the appeal of the Society should be made to all branches of the church and to all Christian people on the broad basis of its world objective."

The report showed Trust Funds accruing from donatins bearing life interest, amounting to $124,436, par value, and other securities of $3,150.

Bequests received in the year, going direct to the Parent Society in London amounted to $7,407, and Legacies for Central Office in Toronto to $6,441,73. From 1916 to 1938 the contributions to the Parent Society amounted to $1,398,577, and Legacies direct to the same office to $37,228, a total of $1,435,805 in the twenty-two years.

The General Secretary also stated that while the sum received in contributions and Legacies showed an increase for the year of $9,046, additional necessary expenses were incurred amounting to $6,043, which meant that our increase in remittances to London amounted to only $3,500.

On Friday evening in the Convocation Hall of the University of Toronto, was held the All-Dominion meeting attended by about 2500 people and addressed by His Excellency Lord Tweedsmuir and others. It was a wonderfully inspiring and impressive service, and the principal address delivered by His Excellency was broadcast, so that all in Canada, who could listen in, would be favoured by hearing him.

During the service a very nicely bound copy of the Bible in Western Cree language was presented by Rev. Mr. Armour to His Excellency, who in response intimated that he was a chief in the tribe and therefore highly appreciated the copy.

After the meeting was over the representatives from the different Auxiliaries throughout Canada, attending the Executive meeting, had the honour and pleasure of personally meeting His Excellency Lord Tweedsmuir.
