MISS BROWN OF X. Y. O.

By E. Phillips Oppenheim (Copyright 1927 by E. Phillips Oppenheim)

"I knew something of this sort would happen," she cried in an agitated tone. "Here's the general! Quick! Slip into that little room behind!"

She opened the communicating doors and closed them again behind the two men. Then she flung herself upon the sofa, lit a cigarette and took up a novel. The maid threw open the door.

"General Maltravers, my lady," she announced.

The general, a short, sturdy man, with iron gray hair and bronzed complexion, entered with some clanking of spurs. Lady Hanerton moved him her hand, which he raised gallantly to his lips. From the moment of his entrance, however, she guessed his errand.

"You haven't come to tell me you can't dine tomorrow night?" she asked anxiously.

"Can't say that that was the object of my visit," he admitted, bringing a chair up to the side of her couch. "I'm afraid I shan't be able to manage it, though."

"Henry!" she exclaimed, reproachfully.

"You see, it's like this, Mona," he went on. "I've had a word or two with you on the subject before, but this time—we've got to tackle it seriously. Of course you married dear old Hanerton and all that, and became one of us, so to speak, and we've always treated you as such, but I mean the fact that you lived in Russia when you were young rather sets these people talking considering your liberal ideas and that sort of thing."

"Yes," she confessed, "it's quite true that I have liberal ideas. You don't want me to be like these other women, do you Henry? You always said that I interested you because I was different. They have nothing to talk about, nothing to think about, except their bridge or their servants or their tennis or the misdemeanors of the colonel's wife, or the flirtations of some one else, or the general hardships of an army life. You don't want me to get into that rut?"

"Look here," he persisted, and there was a ring of something unusual in his tone, "you and I are pals, you know, Mona, but I haven't come to see you this afternoon as a pal. I've come to see you as the general in command of the district here, and I tell you that people are talking in a very queer fashion about you and what seems to be your propaganda. I think if I were you—and you know very well how I hate to say it—I'd leave the neighborhood for a time."

She sat up on the couch, and her soft fingers stole invitingly toward his hand. He rose at once to his feet and stood upon the hearth-rug with his back to the fire.

"I've told you in what capacity I'm here, Mona," he continued, and we've got to face this thing out. There's a great deal of uneasiness throughout the camp. They're worrying me at the War Office about it. It's gone so far that we practically decided to chuck our winter maneuvers. Some fellow's putting up placards all over the place, appealing to the men to elect their own officers, pool us the pay and that sort of thing. I'm not a man whose responsibility for those posters will be shot on sight when we catch him, but there's no doubt that a lot of harm's been done. This talk of yours to the women may be exactly what you mean it to be—nothing but enlightened politics—but it's tending the same way as this infernal propaganda and it's got to stop from Hanerton rose slowly to her feet. To all appearance she was not discomfited but there was a smoldering fire in her eyes.

"You're a little dictatorial, aren't you?" she asked. "I am not a soldier, you know."

"I am speaking with authority," was the blunt reply. "You are living in a military area here, as you've a perfect right to do as poor old Dick's widow, but you come under a certain phase of military jurisdiction, and I don't want any misunderstanding. You were talking of going to Monte Carlo quite soon. Go there at the end of this week. Be out of here by Sunday if you can manage it. Have the house empty by Monday."

"I don't question your motives. I simply say that in conjunction with these damnable placards and pamphlets and the strikes coming on and all that, your attitude on social affairs isn't appreciated down here. I've delivered my ultimatum. That ends my visit officially."

"Now please say something nice to me then, Henry," she begged. "Let me give you a mixed varmouth."

He added, accepted the drink and a cigarette which she lit for him. He passed his right arm round her waist and even accepted and returned the caress of her lips.

"I'm sorry, of course, Mona," he said. "It's been ripping her right up here but it's brought the right up against the red tape at the War Office. You've been jolly indiscreet without a doubt, and this creel without me as a pal," he went on dropping his voice, "there's a pretty well authenticated rumor that you've got some undesirable friends. Cut loose from the whole thing and get off without a moment's delay. Get over to Monte Carlo or somewhere and forget it all. I'm sorry to say you go, but it's got to be, for both our sakes. I'll get a bit of leave later, I expect, but believe me, Mona, I should be saying more than I should do, there's a trouble-headed

Racked by Rheumatism

"Fruit-a-tives" Brought Speedy Relief

Read this honest letter: Nanaimo, B.C.—"I had been suffering with rheumatic pains in my shoulders. Decided to try 'Fruit-a-tives,' in a very short while I had relief. Also had a touch of bleeding piles, 'Fruit-a-tives' worked like a charm. I think they are really marvellous."—Mr. S. Floyd.

secret service working now—home office, military and police—and they're no fools. That's enough, isn't it?"

"Yes, that's enough," she sighed. "By the bye," he went on, "who were those two queer-looking chaps I heard give your address to a taxi-cab man at the station an hour ago?"

"Fellow—looked like any sort of a scoundrel?"

Lady Hanerton laughed softly. "That was Malakoff, the greatest musician in the world," she confided. "The man with him was his secretary."

"Malakoff—chap whose music all the papers are raving about," the general mused. "Don't like the look of him, but I suppose a chap like that can look as he pleases."

"The general glanced out through the rain-streaming window to where his orderly was walking his horse up and down in the dark street."

"This is my last visit, Mona," he told her. "Sorry things have got to come to an end like this. I may get up to town on Sunday night for dinner—not at the club, though. We'll try a quiet place."

"Our farewell," she murmured. "I should love it, Henry—but why not at the club?"

He shrugged his shoulders. "Frankly, I aren't to be seen with you," he confided.

"You mean that I am a suspected person?"

"No use beating about the bush. That's exactly what you are. They'll give you a final word of warning. You'll probably be watched from this moment until you leave. I'll send you a line about Sunday."

He kissed her fingers, then her lips and took his leave. She peered over his shoulder and watched him pass down the narrow path and mount lightly, notwithstanding his fifty years, to his saddle. Then, with a little shrug of the shoulders, she threw open the folding doors.

"Dinner in a quarter of an hour," she announced to the two men. Noel Franklin jerked his thumb over his shoulder toward the road. She answered the note of inquiry in his face with a nod.

"Fins," she assented. "One of the women must have given me away. I have to be out of the neighborhood by Monday."

TO WOMEN OF MIDDLE AGE

Mrs. Wilson's Experience a Guide to Women Passing through the Change of Life

Hamilton, Ontario.—"I have taken several bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I cannot speak too highly of it as I did—I am a farmer's wife, and was all run-down and had no appetite. I was very weak and sick, and the pains in my back were so bad I could hardly move. I got very sad at times and thought I had not a friend on earth. I did not care if I lived or died. I was very nervous, too, and did not go out very much. A friend advised me to try a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, so I did. I am a farmer's wife, and always worked hard until lately, and was in bed for two months. I began to feel like a new woman after the first bottle and I recommend it with great success, also Lydia E. Pinkham's Liver Pills. I am willing to answer letters from women asking about your medicines, as I cannot speak too highly of them."—Mrs. EMMA WILSON, 471 Wilson Street, Hamilton, Ontario.

EXPLORATION OF CANADA

MONTREAL, March 16.—A special exhibition of original sources concerning the exploration of Canada is now being held in the museum of the Redpath Library of McGill University and will continue for some time. It furnishes opportunity for the student of Canadian history to review the most important features of exploration in this country. The exhibition is arranged in four different divisions dealing with the first discoveries of America; the exploration of the St. Lawrence; the exploration of the Pacific coast; and the Hudson Bay and Arctic discoveries.

Probably the most valuable volume in the exhibition is the 1613 edition of "Champlain's Voyages," which was given to the McGill library by E. Griffin in 1877. This volume has since been reprinted by the Champlain Society. The edition in possession of McGill University contains all the plates. One extremely interesting map shows the different fruits and animals found in Canada.

The boy, who is thirteen years old, and the son of the village blacksmith of Chate Standen, on the borders of Hampshire and Wiltshire, found this singularly and delightfully round stone when he was out with the beaters of a shooting party. Ernest thought it was simply too round to be left lying where it was. It was a perfect stone to fling, and he flung it as hard as he could at a boulder.

He hit his mark and the round flint burst like a bombshell, sprinkling the grass with a shower of golden coins. Ernest picked up all together 65 coins, sent them to the British Museum, where they were declared to be ancient British coins more than 2,000 years old. The hollow stone may have served as some ancient Briton's money-box.

The British Museum and the Mint have retained thirty-three specimens to add to the national collections, and the Wiltshire Archaeological Society have purchased the remainder at the full gold value, as estimated by the British Museum.

PLANNING THE FARM ROTATION.

(Experimental Farms Note.) The system of farming to be followed, the type of land, kind of soil, kind of crops that can be grown, together with their ultimate disposition, and the means available for the renewal of soil fertility, are some of the important determining factors in the planning of a rotation.

The final section must be governed largely by the system of farming to be followed. A rotation well suited to one farming system may not prove satisfactory under other conditions. A four-year rotation as follows should crop, grain, hay, pasture is fairly satisfactory for mixed farming practices. A rotation of hoed crop, grain, would be how ever much better suited to the production of large quantities of seed grain, as half of the land being tilled is seeded to grain.

Hoed crop, grain, clover, grain, clover, is a five year rotation well fitted to the needs of the dairy farmer, if it were not for the fact that here is no provision for pasture. Grain, hoed crop, grain, hay, pasture, provides for pastureage but reduces the area available for hay.

The farming system followed, and therefore, the rotation adopted is greatly influenced by the type of land and soil available and the crops that may be grown in the district. With rough broken land available for pasturing of stock, the place of pasturage in the rotation need not be considered.
