FINE FILM SHOWN—An overflow audience of interested spectators attended the second film display put on by the Arts and Crafts Committee in the Art Gallery Wednesday night. Col. L. P. MacDonald presided and reviewed the past efforts of the committee and stated that it is planned to have a community Arts and Crafts Centre opened in Charlottetown by next September. He reported that the City Council had agreed to an annual grant of $1,000 towards the project and it was anticipated that the Provincial Government would also assist. The audience was thrilled as the various films showed the development of the fine arts and handicrafts at Alberta, in Nova Scotia, Ontario, England and Russia, and all agreed that there was a great need in the educational system to provide youth with an opportunity for similar development of their creative instincts and abilities.

Masters Of The Parachute Mail

By Peter Benedict

"No, that's honest. There's more real kick in your smallholding on the moor than there is in the town nightspots. You'll see what I mean. At first it's a novelty. The proprietors of places like those we'll have to visit go out of their way and spend lots of money to keep it a novelty. The craziest things they do. But after your first plunge into it, it's all exactly the same."

A queer little science fell in the car. They were threading a woodland, miles now from Abbotsbridge, headed well out on the next phase of their journey. Peggy sat up and looked round her with interest. Peter had kept to roads where there was no one to see her, or feel any curiosity concerning them both; and in an abstract way which had nothing to do with the quest on which they were riding, she was enjoying the drive.

"I shall feel happier," she said suddenly, "when I'm really Miss Vandeleur, war-paint and costume all complete. Who's going to make me up for the part?"

"Why D'you Want Her Changed?"

"A friend of my sister. She has a fashionable beauty salon in Bond Street. I think she's the best make-up expert I ever saw at work. She'll make you so different that you won't know yourself."

"That's what I need. It's no use pretending that I'm going into a familiar world. I'm not. I feel very young and inexperienced. But if she can really give me a face I can almost believe belongs to someone else, I can play up to it. I've done it before, behind footlights, and I can do it again without them. Will she come to Leckingham Top to-night?"

"She's there now, waiting for us. You'll find tonight rather strenuous, I'm thinking."

"They had driven out of the thunder clouds, and the evening was clearing and deepening over them into the heights of an almost unimaginable loftiness of sky. They were well out of her country now, and she felt safe in exposing her face to the interest of passers-by, even when they threaded towns. No one here knew or had ever heard of her, except as a small paragraph in the papers. No one knew what she looked like, and no one would be surprised to see her looking entirely different tomorrow.

It was well into the evening when, at last, in a narrow by-road, Peter turned the car in at a wicket gate, and they were in the drive of Leckingham Top.

"This is home," he remarked, with satisfaction. "So far, so good, and I believe we shall be just in time for dinner. You must be famished. I'm sorry I couldn't risk stopping."

Peggy had dinner with Peter's family, and found them very different from the lay-figures she had somehow expected. His mother was in the late fifties, and pleasantly and carelessly fat as if she had long ago abandoned beauty—which she had once undoubtedly possessed—to comfort, and had found no reason to regret the choice.

His sister was a few years older than himself, and a business woman who had made her mark in the City world, and apparently had no intention of surrendering her career to marriage, though she was pretty enough to attract men without any trouble. She remarked, when she had run her eye over Peggy's figure, which matched her own in height, that she thought they would fit very well.

"My clothes," she explained, in answer to the question Peggy had not asked. "Peter is quite capable of overcharging his authority for your hotel bills and travelling expenses; but not even he has the nerve to ask them to pay for a trousseau for you. After dinner, and I suppose after Lillas has transformed you, we'll go up and fit you into some of my stuff—all you want, provided you leave me enough to wear."

But the ministrations of Lillas came first, and took longer. She was a woman in the early thirties, of no beauty herself, but of a grace and elegance profound and complete. Every movement even of her hands was the perfection of loveliness. She led Peggy to an easy chair, turned the light full upon her, and for a long time stood contemplating her with a finger to her lips. She smiled. She had a very slow and gradually melting smile which reduced her to the impishly human.

"My child," she said, as an oracle giving judgment, "it is an outrage." And over her shoulder to Peter, who was watching with interest: "I always knew your taste was execrable. Why do you want her changed?"

"Never mind," said Peter. "You produce results, and maybe in a month or so we'll tell you all about it: I want her a few years older; old enough to be her own mistress, and wandering round Europe on her own. What do you suggest?"

Transformation Scene

"A blonde wig," said Lillas promptly, "skin bleached and dried a little—central heating is the very devil to the complexion—and eyebrows and lashes dyed black. I brought several wigs. There's a very nice blonde one—not too childish—long hair, plaited up into a coronal. But and the coronal parting above the plait, and some rouge and eye-shadow, will lengthen her face quite a lot. I should like to change the shape of her eyes and mouth, because they're very individual. That transparent waterproof plaster of mine might do it. I'll lengthen the line of the eyes a bit, and—do you mind if I use the needle on your mouth? It looks much too young and determined as it is."

"I mind," said Peter unexpectedly. "It hurts like the devil, and I won't have it."

"If it's necessary," said Peggy, "go ahead. What is it, a sort of tattooing?"

"Yes, except that I can get it out again. I want to change the shape of your lips." She traced with the tip of a slender forefinger the slim hollow line of Peggy's lower lip, on either side. "I want it filled in—so, there and there—less finely shaped, more indulgent. It will alter you more than anything except the wig. But if Peter says—"

"Hang what Peter says! Go ahead."

He laughed. It was the first time she had used his name. "Very well! On your own head be it."
