Marriage Scales

WHEELS IN MOTION
Early next morning Charles proceeded to set in motion the wheels of the scheme which he and Craig Cullum had worked out so laboriously the night before.
Much to his disgust, his bathroom mirror, into which he glanced after his shave, revealed him looking remarkably healthy. He was far from a picture of blighted romance. There was no interesting pallor about him. His cheeks were ruddy, and not even the wildest and most charitable imagination could find a trace of haggardness about them. His eyes were a trifle blood-shot from lack of sleep—that was positively all, and it was scarcely noticeable.
He presented the fact that there was nothing to show that he was suffering the torment of the doomed. The hope of salvation which Craig Cullum had held out the night before burned feebly now in the light of day and realities. The whole scheme outlined by Cullum seemed wild and impossible. Charles couldn't share Cullum's confidence in its ultimate success. He reflected gloomily that Cullum could be cheerfully optimistic because he had nothing, priceless at stake. The young actor was not facing the loss of a beautiful and desirable wife, a love that was poignant enough to twist his heart strings, and a home of which he was justly proud. Even if Cullum's fantastic scheme succeeded in disillusioning Mariana and making her fall out of love with the actor, it didn't matter that she would fall in love with Charles again. That was the thought which recurred insistently to him as he went down to breakfast.
He had not seen Mariana since she left him abruptly in the library the previous evening, after her startling announcement that she loved Craig Cullum and wanted her freedom. He was a bit unprepared to find her looking cool and serene, and untroubled.

Being unversed in the ways of women, and especially of the woman of this particular class (though he fatuously believed otherwise), he could not guess that Mariana was now sweetly assured of the irreproachableness of her conduct. To her own mind, her full confession was in the nature of an explanation. She had fulfilled her promise to tell Charles if she ever came to love someone else. She no longer possessed a disturbing secret. She had shifted full responsibility for the next act of the little marital drama upon his shoulders, and she went her way serenely unconcerned that she was being both selfish and cruel. Nevertheless there was a shadow in her eyes. After all, she loved a man who had given no indication of caring for her. Only her confidence in the weapons of her own beauty and charm kept her from weeping over that realization.
The meal began a little awkwardly. Mariana spoke politely of the weather. Charles replied that it had been hotter than the deuce when he came home last night. He didn't add that he had been to see Craig Cullum.
A new neutral note was introduced by the appearance of over-crisp bacon. Charles irritably rejected it and sent it, and a rebuke, back to the chef.
Mariana remarked with a sigh, "Oh dear, I dare say he'll give notice now!"
To this Charles replied: "Let him give it. The fence take him anyway. I'm tired of being ruled by a tyrant in the kitchen. I've a mind to fire the whole downstairs tribe!"
Mariana sighed again, shrugged, and said, "Perhaps it's just as well," she said significantly.

"You mean—?"
"After our discussion last night we can't very well continue—" Mariana finished with an expressive gesture of her hands.
Charles frowned, cleared his throat a bit sternly.
"Now see here, Mariana. If I'm going to agree to your proposition of yours, you might at least grant me a little consideration."
"Of course," she assented politely.
"What is it you want me to do?"
"It's just this," he told her earnestly. "Don't, I beg of you, create a scandal and a lot of gossip right now. Wait until it's time to go away for the summer, and then send your trunk to Reno—I dare say that's where you'll want to go. I'll ramble up to Canada, get myself lost in the woods, and nobody'll be the wiser until the whole business is over."
Mariana looked doubtful.
"Do you really think that's best? People have to know sooner or later, so why not—?"
"Now, please, Mariana," he interposed. "Grant me this one last favor. I'll keep away as much as possible. I won't annoy you, I promise you. We'll go ahead with our plans for a couple of weeks just as though nothing had happened. This house party at Three Oaks for Craig—"
Mariana checked him with an exclamation of astonishment.
"Surely you don't mean to go through with that?" she gasped. "Not after—?"
"I do mean it," he insisted with stubbornness. "My relationship with Craig

BENTLEY'S A Unique School

The Bentley School of Accounting and Finance of Boston is an outstanding example of the results that logically follow the giving of service to its student body.
Starting in 1917 with a class of 29, it attained an enrollment of 2292 during the school year of 1923-24. This growth seems remarkable, but is only the natural sequence of maintaining high scholastic standards, allowing men who cannot meet these standards to repeat the entire course once without charge in order that they may acquire proficiency, placing its graduate body in positions of responsibility, and showing an unceasing interest in their welfare by moving them to more remunerative positions of greater responsibility and trust after they have acquired the necessary experience. This school meets the requirements of the business world by training men to become specialists in the most important field of business administration.
Its graduates are given a preference by many public accounting firms, and some of the leading industrial concerns send representatives each year to select men from its graduating class for their accounting departments. Its graduates hold remunerative positions throughout the United States and in several foreign countries. Members of the class of 1923 were placed in all of the New England states, New York, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, California, Costa Rica, Honduras, Guatemala, Colombia, and Cuba. Many members of the 1924 graduating class have already been placed in the large cities of the United States and in foreign countries.
"Mutual Service" is the motto of this school and "Progress" its watchword. Its student body is so loyal and enthusiastic that nearly 80% of the entire enrollment is the result of personal recommendations of men who have studied at this school and friends who know of the high-grade work that the school is doing.
The appointments and equipment of its educational plant at 921 Boylston Street, Boston, are said to be among the finest of any school in the United States. The days of apprenticeship are over; business is a profession, and a man must be specially trained to master a particular line in order to succeed.
The Bentley School reflects the spirit of the age by training men to successfully withstand the keen competition that exists in the large field of business.
