THE OUTLAW

The Story of a Girl Who Didn't Want to Marry By ETHEL LLOYD PATT.

Chapter XXVIII

The following Sunday at about half past 2, a smart little two-seater roadster drew up in front of our door. Hugh Trotter and a clean, well-built young man hopped out of it. I had been wondering whether Hugh would remember his promise to bring a young doctor to see my mother. He had made the suggestion to do so, casually enough. I had had to learn that, behind his light way of talking, there was always real earnestness.

I think, too, probably mother had thought no more about it. Perhaps she believed he would forget once he was out of the house. When I saw the two young men coming towards the house, I ran up stairs calling mother. "Dear," I said, "Hugh is coming, and I think he must have the doctor he spoke of with him."

"Well, that's downright nice of that young man, said mother, "but he needn't bother, dearie. I don't hold much with doctors, anyhow, and I don't think any of them can do me any good."

However, she took off her apron and straightened her hair, and went downstairs with me to greet Hugh and the young man. The doctor proved to be a Dr. Parker—bright, kind, and earnest, and just a year out of medical college. For a while we all chatted together downstairs in the sitting room. I think the doctor, although at first he asked mother no direct questions—was watching her closely. At last he suggested that they go upstairs together, and Hugh was left alone with me.

Then I told Hugh about my moving picture business, and he said "two before, when I was out at the studio, I had been carried away by the story that was being filmed and had cried. I said that my tears had attracted the attention of the director and, although it had been furthest from my thought at the time, I was in hopes now that my emotion might be the means of giving me a little better chance in the work."

Hugh offered to take me to another moving picture concern, where he knew several men. He said that perhaps if the Champion Film Company realized I could get a position elsewhere they might be willing to give me some sort of a regular salary to remain with them. Of course, that was what I wanted. In the week, just passed they had employed me for three days. This gave me the opportunity to earn nine dollars. By being paid by the day as I was, and needing money at home as much as we did, the livelihood I earned in that we was precarious. I preferred some sam regularly, however small.

So Hugh and I sat there and talked—he advising me; I listening and explaining more fully what our situation was in the family—until mother and the young doctor came downstairs again. Mother was still smiling, but it seemed to me that Dr. Parker looked ed grave. I jumped up as they came into the room. "There's nothing much the matter with mother, is there?" I asked. "If she could just get a little rest for a few weeks she'd be well again, wouldn't she?" Dr. Parker shook his head slowly. "She needs more than a few weeks' rest, Miss Nell," he said. "She needs years of rest really. She should never work again. And she needs an operation pretty badly, too."

"An operation?" I repeated. Why mother! Are you in any pain?" "Well, Nellie, dear—" began mother, when Dr. Parker interrupted her. "Why, Miss Nell," he said "I don't see how your mother has managed to stand on her feet this last year. It's wonderful the things women can do, if they have to. Evidently she didn't have the proper care when your baby sister was born, and she's never had any proper care since."

"Oh, don't you suppose I know that?" I cried resentfully. "I pose I know my father's a brute? I was the only one with mother when Jane was born. Mother begged father to get her a doctor, but he was—" "Hugh, dear," said mother, "it's over—no use getting angry about it now."

"It's terrible!" I went on hotly, "we're fathers children just as much as we're here, but she has to bear all the pain—he won't even take care of her. I tell you, if she's sick and dies, he's just a murderer—that's what he is!"

The tears were standing in my eyes now, and my voice quivered. Hugh crossed the room and laid his hand gently on my arm. "Don't talk like that," he said. "Don't you see you only hurt your mother more, and don't you understand that it isn't exactly your father's fault either? It's life, my dear. We all of us have to struggle against it."

I flung off Hugh's hand with a quick, rude gesture. "Oh, don't touch me!" I cried through my teeth. "I don't want any man to touch me! It isn't life! It's just men who are beasts! I can't bear to see my mother suffer."

And then, since the sobs were choking my throat, I turned and fled upstairs to my own room.

ADDRESS AND PRESENTATION On the evening of Monday June 27th the friends and neighbors of Mr. and Mrs. Bernard McCourt, Emerald gathered at their home in large numbers and presented them with an address and a well filled purse, the occasion being the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage. After the reading of the address and several congratulatory speeches by those present, Mr. McCourt, replied thanking all for their kindness and generosity after which all were invited to the dining room where they were sumptuously entertained by the host and hostess and where ample justice was done to a bountiful repast prepared in Mrs. McCourt's well known style. The remainder of the evening was pleasantly spent in music, songs and dancing after which all returned to their homes well satisfied with the evening's entertainment and wishing Mr. and Mrs. McCourt many years of health and happiness.

Following is the address. To Mr. and Mrs. Bernard McCourt: Dear Friends: On this golden anniversary of your marriage we your friends and neighbors gather around you this evening to offer you our congratulations and best wishes on this happy occasion. To but very few is granted the blessing of marriage a half century of married life together and it is fitting that we who have known you all these years, should rejoice with you on this occasion.

Fifty years ago today you stood at the altar with your young bride and pledged your faith to each other for better or for worse, and during all these many years of wedded life you have always been the ideal husband and wife. Your exemplary lives have always been a source of admiration to all those who had the pleasure of your acquaintance and your hospitable home has always been a place where friends or strangers were ever sure of receiving a hearty and cordial welcome.

You both began your married life on a small farm in what was then practically a wilderness, with very little else of the world's goods than a vigorous constitution and faith in your ability to conquer all obstacles that might come your way, and by hard work, perseverance and industry you have succeeded in establishing not only, one of the best and most comfortable homes in this vicinity, but also a name for integrity, uprightness and honesty, so that today your work is considered as good as your bond. You have added farm after farm to your original holding until today your property occupies a large territory in this district. You have been blessed with a large family of sons and daughters, whom you have brought up to be good and worthy members of the community, and who will be a source of consolation to you in your declining years most of whom you have the satisfaction of seeing over all comfortable farms, all around you. You were both always ready and willing to lend a helping hand to any one in distress, or those needing assistance in any way, and very few of us but have experienced your kindness and assistance on very many occasions. As a citizen you always took a lively interest in the affairs of your country, both in church and state and was always willing and anxious to assist any movement for the good of the community. During all these years you were ably assisted by your good wife, who proved herself to be a worthy helpmate to you on all occasions and who very justly and deservedly enjoys the love and respect, not only of her own family but of all those who have the pleasure of her acquaintance. We are pleased therefore to tender you this offering not in consideration of its intrinsic value but as a souvenir of the occasion and a small token of our respect and esteem.

In conclusion then dear friends we are pleased to see you both looking so hale and hearty and hope you may live to celebrate the diamond jubilee of your marriage.

WEALTH IN ONTARIO ON THE INCREASE—In the course of an address on "Succession Duties" at the monthly luncheon of the Life Underwriters' Association in the Hotel Mossop, Mr. John Cowan, of the Toronto General Trusts Corporation, emphasized the steady increase in the general wealth of the people of Ontario during the past five years. Mr. Cowan cited from statistics showing that the number of persons who died in 1916 less than thirty per cent left estates to be administered, while in 1920 the percentage had risen to over fifty per cent. Out of the 11,554 persons who died in 1920 leaving estates, 9,000 had left estates of less than $5,000 in value. Mr. Cowan pointed out that the principal asset in a large number of these estates was insurance monies, thus demonstrating that for the great majority of the people insurance presents the only opportunity they have of creating an estate.

Ford THE UNIVERSAL CAR THE Ford is a standardized car. By devoting all our time and facilities to the building of one design, savings in manufacturing costs with maintenance of quality are effected. First—through quantity purchase of high quality materials at lower cost—Think what a force goes behind the buyer for the Ford Motor Company when he enters the market for a quarter of a million wheels. The quality is maintained, but the quantity has its effect on the price. Second—Ford workmen are specialists. The production in thousands instead of hundreds of any individual part under the hands of the same workmen, with tools and machinery especially designed for the Ford Motor Company, creates efficiency, resulting in quantity and quality production. Third—by avoiding radical changes in design there is no scrapping of machinery, of dies, patterns or materials, all of which result in increased manufacturing costs, which must be added to the selling price of a car. Materials and workmanship of the Ford Car are the best. The low price is the result of standardization, large production and our manufacturing methods. Wherever you go—Ford Service Ford Motor Company of Canada, Limited, Ford, Ontario
