Early Church History In P.E.I.
(By Uncle Joe)

XII

The story of St. Paul's Church differs from the story of Presbyterianism or Methodism as far as its early existence in this Island is concerned. And like other early churches of the period covered by this sketch, it had a colorful and varied career.

When in 1769, the Island of St. John got a government separate from that of Nova Scotia, H. B. George III ordered that one hundred pounds sterling should be granted for the stipend of a clergyman, the Rev. John Caulfield was, by Royal Warrant, appointed rector of the Parish of Charlotte, while the Rev. R. Grant became Chaplain to Governor Patterson at a salary of fifty pounds sterling.

It is interesting to note that while Caulfield held this post for over four years, he never left the Mother Country. Nor did Mr. Grant. Patterson himself did not come to the Island until 1770.

After repeated requests by the Governor to the Home Government, funds to build a church was granted. But the money was used to pay the salaries of the Civil List which, at that time, was sadly in arrears. Thus short of its funds the church remained the dream it had been for another thirty years. In the meantime services continued to be held in Richardson's tavern in Queen Street. We are not told who did the preaching during those years. Warburton tells us that the Rev. John Eggleston, of Fort Cumberland, preached three times in the City during the fall of 1773, but makes no reference to other clergymen of this denomination.

In a letter to Lord Dartmouth, dated Sept. 1773, Gov. Patterson said: "I can no longer keep from representing to your Lordship that the minister appointed for the town has not, as yet, made his appearance among us, nor has he ever once thought proper to assign any reason for his absence, nor do I believe he has ever made application anywhere for leave."

This was a cause for great concern among certain members of the body, and they have been the cause of many leaving the Island, after coming here with the purpose of permanent settlement. One is able to glean something of the feelings of those people when one learns that their children were growing up unchristianized and without adequate religious training.

First, Capt. G. G. DesBrisay was obliged to resign a position which he filled in name only, and the appointment to the Parish of Charlotte was given to the Rev. Theophilus DesBrisay. The year was 1774, but he did not reach here until the following year. Mr. DesBrisay was rector of the parish of Charlotte until his death, which occurred March 14, 1823.

Perhaps Mr. DesBrisay's greatest achievement came in 1773, while en route to Charlottetown from Canso. The vessel conveying him, together with Mr. Spence, a member of the Island Council, were captured by two American Privateers. The vessels had plundered Charlottetown, and had on board Mr. Spence, and other persons, including Mr. Patterson's absence in England, and a Mr. Wright. The Privateers were on their way to General Washington's headquarters in Cambridge Heights. After being held prisoners for a short time Mr. Spence and Mr. DesBrisay were released. The pair returned to Charlottetown in a small boat, minus everything but their clothes and bedding.

To add to his misery, DesBrisay found no church, no provisions for food, and little prospect of getting his salary. Disgusted with the whole set-up, he became a chaplain on board one of H. M.'s warships, visiting his parish at irregular intervals. But in 1777, the British Government assumed official services, formerly charged in "quit rents". And thereafter, the Rector received a salary of 150 pounds sterling. He then took up residence in the city. Since then the parish has always had a rector living on the Island.

But not until 1890 did the people's dream of a church, come true. The new edifice was for the use of the Established Churches of England and Scotland. The first St. Paul's was large enough to seat about four hundred persons.

In June, 1828, the Rev. L. C. Jenkins became rector; he held office for a period of twenty-six years.

By this time, the first church was fast becoming unfit for use. Too, a new site was desired as well as a new church, where the congregation could worship God according with the rites of the Established Church of England.

The site chosen for the new church was Queen Square. When the building was nearly completed it blew down. The work was for one reason or another was held up until 1835. It was consecrated that same year by the Right Rev. John Inglis, Bishop of Nova Scotia, and given the name of St. Paul's Church.

In 1858 Rev. Donald Fitzgerald was inducted as rector. He held the office for about twenty-eight years.

The contract for the present splendid church was made out, on Oct. 23, 1864, with the consecration taking place the following May. On Sunday, May 3rd, 1866, the old St. Paul's held its last divine service. The next Sunday the new St. Paul's was opened for worship, and the present service was held the following July.

Second Chance
By Rosamund Dujardin

Jon stood there, staring blankly straight before him. Good old Cassie... blessed Cassie, saying in words of one syllable the things he should have known all along. The truths he should have sensed, knowing Lisbeth, Reid and Gay! Of course! That was the sense that added up, as Reid and Lisbeth never had. Except, Jon accused himself sternly, in his own perverted, ugly, jealous thoughts. The parts of the whole crazy jigsaw of these recent, difficult months fell neatly into place.

That night in New York, so long ago, so crystal clear in memory, when Lisbeth had stood in Reid's arms, he had seen her. He had seen her, when she had been shielding her again in Reid's hotel room when he, Jon, had burst in. It was Gay's letter she had sought. Now he knew. Now when it was too late... how that he had lost her.

But he would find her again. He must find her. He must tell her how wrong he'd been and ask forgiveness and beg her to come back. To come back a small clear voice within him asked to Miles? But Miles had said—what was it Miles had said? Jon recalled, trying to remember something about Lisbeth not caring as he cared something about her having loved before. But if she hadn't loved Reid Terry...

Now for the first time Jon found himself remembering, without bitterness or suspicion, those early days of his association with Lisbeth in New York. Recalling their sweetness and the breadth and depth of that feeling of his that there was more to come. Could Lisbeth have shared that as he had hoped at first? He would know, he must know, as soon as he had found her... and he would find her...

The Palm Grove was not a fashionable night spot. Chicago cafe society was serenely unaware of its very existence. Nevertheless, Herman Behrens, who owned and operated the unpretentious little place was content.

From his small, cluttered office near the check-room, Herman superintended the Palm Grove like a benevolent if slightly ruffled hen with one demanding chick. He trusted no detail of management to his subordinates, hired and fired and made decisions. He kept a fat, but sensitive finger on the pulse of his respectable, middle-class clientele. And he made money.

If the fact that the Palm Grove was unfashionable bothered Herman no whit, it was nothing less than a godsend to his newest entertainer, Lisbeth Carmichael, felt as safe from observation by any one who knew her as though she had died and opened her eyes at last on a totally alien and singularly uncelibate hereafter. Some times, looking back at that other life of hers, that distant, different

Perhaps the fact that she felt so little like singing lent a quality of heartbreak to her throaty, moving voices. She stood one September morning in the slightly echoing confines of the Palm Grove and sang, not because it was new, but because Herman Behrens happened to need a singer who could put over that sort of song. Thanks for the Memory. And Herman sat and watched and listened.

When Lisbeth sang, with a little, breathless break in her low voice, a warm personality of feeling.

"Darling how are you... And how are all the little dreams That never did come true?"

Herman, who was a simple person and unashamed of simple sentimentality, found himself with tears in his eyes. And Lisbeth found herself with a job.
