town about 4.30 p. m. One was a single-engine Harvard plane similar to those in use at the R. C. A. F. camp at Summerside while the other appeared to be an Anson, twin-engine plane, the type used at the R. A. F. camp in Charlottetown. The latter was flying very high but as the watchers faced west it was difficult to get a clear picture because the sun was in their eyes. "The first thing I noticed was a puff of smoke," Mr. McAulay said. "We thought something had gone wrong with the plane. Then we saw a parachute opening and followed it to Little Harbour where it fell in a field," he added. The air observer was one of the first to examine the parachute and the attached bomb. The latter was very hot when picked up, he declared. It was attached to the parachute by means of a two-foot wire which passed up through its centre. The parachute was about eight feet in diameter when opened out into the wind. It was made of the best quality of silk. Both planes continued flying east after the parachute was dropped and appeared to pay no attention to it. Mr. McAulay stated, Peter Creamer who picked up the parachute, "kept it until he was ready to turn it over to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Corporal L. S. Souris Detachment, R.C.M.P. who was away when the incident took place. It is conducting an investigation into the matter. Group Captain E. A. Blake, Officer Commanding the No. 31 General Reconnaissance School, Lt. A. F. when informed of the strange happening last evening, said that no report of any flares dropped had been received from any of his men. However, the possibility of one of these having accidentally dropped from a plane was suggested.

Group Captain Blake Gives address on Civilian aid in war

Work in itself cannot be replaced entirely by money. It is the effort of the individual to contribute and to create aid to watch and war, which in the end must tell. A nation with only money, and no one to do the work would be a poor nation in war, or at any other time. Therefore, one of the citizen's first duties, is to work harder than he would in peace, for not only must he produce more necessary goods, but he must take the place of those men who have already left and are engaged in the active fighting. Without real earnest, honest hard work in their respective trades and professions, by all members of society, the first basis of real war effort from the civilian point of view cannot be maintained. Strikes, hold-ups, and slow methods must of necessity mar this effort.

In Great Britain the people have been forced into a habit of living in which the individual actually gives the maximum aid in his power to the war effort. Until the "Blitzes" started, the man in the street felt that the war is the example of Great Britain today. All personnel have not only willingly allowed themselves to be rationed in commodities considered necessities, but have of their own free will learned to save all waste and economize in many things not enforced. Supplies must be provided for the war effort. Traffic on railways and shipping must be conserved to the utmost. In this respect, it is every citizen's duty to consider the economic need of all foods, fuels, and all other material supplies. Wastage or unnecessary use not only absorbs the article in question, but also enforces more work and places a bigger load on communications in order.
