Forest Fires A National Responsibility

OTTAWA, May 4.—In an appeal for forest fire prevention, the Department of Mines and Resources, Ottawa, points out that forest fires in Canada during the last ten years have caused a direct loss of more than forty-eight million dollars. This statement does not tell the whole story, as it is impossible to estimate in dollars and cents the indirect losses in soil fertility and scenic value and the damage caused by floods, soil erosion, and the lowering of water levels in streams, all of which are the inevitable results of extreme denudation.

Forest fires are by no means a modern evil, as scars on ancient trees give mute evidence of forest fires long before the advent of civilized man. Most of these prehistoric fires were probably started from lightning, but in recent years with the improvements in transportation facilities and the increasing use of the forests for recreational purposes, eighty-five per cent of all forest fires have been caused by man, either willfully or by carelessness.

The high percentage of man-caused fires can be greatly reduced by the exercise of caution on the part of the public, and all those who travel in or near the forest are strongly urged to be careful with fire at all times. The late spring is one of the greatest danger periods of the year, and various forest protection agencies throughout Canada including Dominion, provincial and private, stand ready to face the danger of fire which follows the drying winds of late April and early May. These winds remove the moisture from the previous year's dead vegetation leaving it dry and highly inflammable. Not until the June rains and the advent of new green vegetation will this fire hazard subside. Two other danger periods when fires will spread rapidly and assume large proportions are in the summer months during protracted periods of dry hot weather, and again in the fall, after the ground vegetation has been killed by early frosts and subsequently dried out by high winds and hot sunny days.

In providing the raw material for Canada's third primary industry, the forests are a great source of national wealth and employment, and the problem of safe-guarding this great heritage against the constant threat of destruction by fire is therefore of utmost importance to all. The forest resources are so interlocked with the many phases of personal and industrial life of the country that to destroy them wantonly, or to stand heedlessly by while they are devoured by flames, is to impair the basis of the nation's social and economic existence.

SASKATCHEWAN PREPARES FOR JUNE ELECTION

REGINA, May 2.—(CP)—Although Premier W. J. Patterson remains silent on Saskatchewan's provincial election date, action is the theme song of party campaigners whose predictions on voting days range from June 1 to 20. Already 20 candidates have gained party approval and are crowding the hustings.

Premier Patterson whose Liberal Government of 50 members was swept into power June 19, 1934, will receive nomination May 6 in his Cannington constituency. George H. Williams, who led the five-member "Farmers" opposition in the last House, will appear again in Wadena.

Members Reduced
Under the redistribution bill passed at the last session, which wound up March 28, the number of members was cut from 55 to 52 and constituencies arranged so eight were eliminated and five new ones formed. Ridings of two cabinet members affected.

Notukeu, represented by Hon. George Spence, minister of public works, disappeared. Mr. Spence, however, has quit the political fold to head the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation work. Francis constituency which sent Hon. C.M. Dunn, highways minister, to the House was washed away but Mr. Dunn was the unanimous choice of Liberals in Melville for the coming elections.

Unanimous Selections
Two other cabinet ministers, Hon. J. W. Estey and Hon. J. G. Taggart, have received unanimous approval of party conventions. Mr. Estey, education minister, will carry the Liberal colors with Mayor R. M. Finckler in the new member riding of Saskatoon while Mr. Taggart will bear the Government burden in Swift Current.

Mr. Estey and Mr. Finckler will face Dr. J. T. McEwen, former Conservative Premier, and Alderman S. N. MacEachern who will be the Conservative candidate in Saskatoon.

Entered Lists
So far 26 Liberals have entered the lists while the Farmer-Labor opposition or Co-operative Commonwealth Federation candidates, have appeared in 23 ridings. Conservatives have been nominated in 14; Social Credit in one; Independents in three; Labor-Progressive in two and a straight Labor in one. Rev. P. Peters is the first Social Credit representative. He is running in Rosethorn constituency. However, meetings throughout the province are planned to choose other standard bearers.

A possible new trade to the various colors floating over the speaking platforms was added last week when talk of a Fascist candidate was heard at the Battleford. W. Fries, formerly a homesteader at Goodsoil, now self-styled organizer of the party, arranged a meeting in North Battleford for tonight to consider Fascist entries.

CHAPTER XIV
THREE WOULD-BE BURGLARS

While the gale roared in from the sea and rocked the House of the Birds, three men pondered on the problems of successful burglary. One of them was Heinrich, Professor Peimann's giant servant. As soon as his master's unsuspecting guests were safely disposed of, Heinrich slipped out of the house and battled his way against the mighty wind to The Lighthouse, now empty of all occupants.

On the empty moor, in the inadequate shelter of a giant boulder, and with his feet in a bag which was rapidly becoming a quagmire, General Alan Carmichael Mitchell reflected ruefully on the disadvantages of his trade.

In the House of the Birds itself, Halford sat on the edge of his bed and waited impatiently. He glanced at his watch, and decided that it would not be safe to make a move for a while yet. He must be sure that everything was as quiet as he descended to the library and began his search for the document which Wolff had ordered him to procure.

General Mitchell shivered and drew his sudden coat closer about his shoulders. He shrank into the shelter of his bed as a faint figure lumbered through the curtain of rain and passed along the path close to him. He could not make out the man's features, but he felt the weight of a hand on his shoulder. He gripped the handle of the bedroom door and eased it gently round. Then he pulled the door open, straining against the weight of the hinges and preventing creaking. Nevertheless the door came open with a sharp crack. Halford stopped his heart in his mouth.

He need not have feared. The storm was making enough row, rattling window panes, howling down chimneys and banging incessantly against the roof to drown the noise of an advancing army.

The corridor outside was in darkness, but a row of skylights along the ceiling cast a dim light. Halford peered down the dark tunnel. Nothing stirred.

He softly closed the bedroom door behind him and tiptoed along the corridor. At the top of the staircase he groped for the banister and looked over into the hall below. It was dark and deserted. He crept down the stairs, making every effort to avoid creaking tread. He had tried to memorize which ones creaked on the floor, but he was not sure. He still nothing.

But the noise of the storm, which he had heard him do had its disadvantages. It was unlikely that he could be heard by anybody still awake. On the other hand, he could hear nothing. A hidden watcher could creep upon him unawares, and launch an attack while his back was turned.

Halford imagined the great hands of the giant Heinrich closing suddenly about his throat, and shuddered.

Better to get it over with. Less careful about noise, he sped swiftly in the direction of the library.

No light shone from under the door. The room was apparently unoccupied. Nevertheless, he hesitated long before he gripped the door knob and started turning it, hesitated until the darkness of the corridor and the fear found him to the lion. Out in the corridor he felt naked and exposed. Inside the room he would at least be hidden from any other prowler of the night.

He pushed gently against the door the handle fully turned and held right in his hand. The door opened slowly. He tilted through the narrow space and flattened himself against the wall, eyes sweeping the darkness.

He could make out the dark outlines of the bookcases and the black oblongs of the curtains. The light glinted on dark polished wood, from the embers of a dying fire. Chairs formed an uneven half-circle round the fire. A decanter of whisky rested on a little side table. There was the smell of cigar smoke in the air. The room was exactly as he had left it.

Halford's first move despite the urgency of his quest, was in the direction of the whisky.

He splashed whisky into a glass and gulped it down. Then he felt better.

Halford turned and ran his eyes along the dark line of the bookcases. Which had been the one at which Shane had stopped, and which the book that had attracted his attention and caused the professor to lead him hurriedly away before he could take it from the shelf?

All was different in the dark. Halford stopped uncertainly before one of the cases. He thought it had been this one. But he realized with dismay that he would need light to find the particular volume. He could not grope his way blindly through the shelves. The case must contain at least five hundred volumes. It would take him until morning to get through them all, and the resulting confusion would show that a burglar had been at work.

He should have brought a torch. But he had not thought of it, and it was too late now.

He nerved himself to switch on the lights. But first of all he lifted a newspaper from a chair and twisted it into a narrow, thick strip. This he jammed under the door. Thus no light would show in the corridor outside. And the heavy curtain over the windows would be sufficient protection so far as the outside of the house was concerned.

Moreover, the newspaper would serve as a primitive alarm, for anybody trying the door would move the paper.

Feeling rather pleased with his ingenuity, Halford boldly switched on the light. But first of all he lifted a newspaper from a chair and twisted it into a narrow, thick strip. This he jammed under the door. Thus no light would show in the corridor outside. And the heavy curtain over the windows would be sufficient protection so far as the outside of the house was concerned.

He reached up eagerly and took it down and an envelope slipped from between the pages into his hand.

Halford stared at the envelope, dazed by his success. He had not expected such speedy results. Then the success joined with the whisky to produce a feeling of wild elation. No longer bothering about noise or possible intruders, he shoved back the book and crossed to the fireplace. He dropped into a chair and began to examine his find.

The envelope bore a French postmark, and was addressed to Professor Peimann, c/o Skozzway Post Office, the Island of Lewis. Halford pinched the mouth open and drew out several sheets of thin notepaper covered with spidery handwriting.

Then his jaw dropped. A single glance was enough to show him that the letter was in code.

Planting Methods For Seeding Legumes

In anticipation of requests from farmers for information on methods of growing legumes for seed, the Division of Forage Plants, Central Experimental Farm, Ottawa, has the honor to advise that it has past three years along these lines. Particular attention has been paid to the comparison between row seeding versus broadcast seeding of red clover and alfalfa for seed production.

Results to date indicate that yields of alfalfa seed can be increased from 35 to 50 per cent by sowing the crop in rows two and a half feet apart with a very light nurse crop, as compared with sowing broadcast, which is the usual method. Red clover, on the other hand, seems to react quite differently. A decrease of about 25 per cent may be expected if this crop is seeded in rows. This difference between alfalfa and red clover is probably due to differences in the habit of growth of the two species.

It should be pointed out, states R. MacVicar, of the Forage Plants Division, Dominion Experimental Farms that while the row seeding of alfalfa has resulted in higher yields of seed, there are several considerations that should be kept in mind. Factors such as type of land and cost of cultivation and the freedom of the land from weeds, have to be considered and any extra cost involved balanced against the increased revenue from the crop.
