Lenten Meditations

From The Times, London

SPiritUAL RENEWAL

The season of Lent is approached by Christians in many different ways. Its meaning for the individual is bound to be affected by his own religious background and experience. For some Lent is essentially a time of heart-searching, of introspection, of self-denial, and even of self-abasement; a kind of spring-cleaning of one's spiritual house. The value of such an approach need not be denied, though when it is over-emphasized it may easily lead to an unhealthy morbidly. Even in religious experience, and there is the ever-present subtle temptation to that spiritual pride which is all too closely associated with extreme self-abasement. For others, the coincidence of the season with spring suggests the thought of renewal of life, new beginnings, and a new and more complete dedication of the life with all its potentialities to God.

But whatever his approach the Christian may think of the season as an opportunity and a call to wait and understand the meaning of the Christian faith, and a deeper experience of his soul-renewing power; thus fulfilling its main purpose as a preparation for the most complete response to the truth and the claims of the Easter message. If the season is used as an occasion for the special study of our Lord's teaching—his words and the ideal of life which both by precept and example he set before men—it may well be a springtime for new vision and understanding, a time for recognizing afresh and seeking to overcome personal and corporate shortcomings. This will involve both thought and worship; study and prayer.

The positive value of Lent to the individual is apt to be lost sight of if it is too exclusively concentrated upon the negative. If, however, self-examination is used as a means to an end it will have its place, with its grasp and study, in the renewing of the spiritual life, and will add reality to the prayer that "we may obey the godly motions in righteousness and true holiness."
